QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

B. S. K., Saginaw, Mich. Was Christ made higher than angels, as we read in Heb. 1:4; or was he lower than the angels, as we read in Heb. 2:9?

Christ's nature was higher than that of angels, as the writer shows; but he voluntarily humiliated himself by taking on human nature, which, as is proved by the quotation from Psalm 8:5, in Heb. 2:7, is lower than that of angels. He thus became temporarily, and for a definite purpose, lower than the angels, though they never forgot his divine nature, but ministered unto him. In the margin of the Revised Version you will find the rendering which solves your difficulty: "Made for a little while lower than the angels."

Apropos of the recent anniversary of Washington, Miss Mary Barton Cookman writes:

As the busy crowd pass up and down Broadway, how few stop to think of the historic interest which clusters about old St. Paul's Chapel at Broadway, Fulton and Vesey streets. This chapel is the oldest public building, and the only Colonial church building in New York City. For twelve years after the Revolution it was the parish church. Immediately after his inauguration as first President of the United States, on April 30, 1789, George Washington, with both Houses of Congress, came in procession to St. Paul's Chapel, where appropriate services were held by Bishop Provoost, chaplain of the Senate, and a solemn "Te Deum" was sung. In Washington's diary, from 1789 to 1791, as regularly as Sunday comes round, is the entry, "Went to St. Paul's Chapel, in the forenoon."

J. A. H. 1. What is the difference between Jewish and our months? 2. Why was February chosen for leap-year?

1. The Jewish calendar is dated from the creation, which is considered to have taken place 3,760 years and three months before the Christian era. The Hebrew months are called Nisan (which is the first month of the sacred year. It has thirty days, and answers generally to the moon of March and April). Iyar, corresponds to the moon of April or May; Sivan, moon of May or June; Tamuz, moon of June or July; Ab, moon of July or August; Elul, moon of August or September; Tishri, moon of September or October; Heshvan, moon of October or November; Kislev, moon of November or December; Tebeth, moon of December or January; Sebat, moon of January or February; and Adar, twelfth month, moon of February or March. 2. February is the shortest month in the year, and when there is an extra day every fourth year, it is added to the February of that year, so that in leap-year it has 29 days.

How I Worked My Way Around the World is certainly a charming narrative. One gets his money's worth of reading before half way through the book. It is a story that is interesting to old and young, and the writer deserves much credit, as does THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, for giving such a premium.
Auburn, Neb. ANNA DEMAREE.

Ellen M., Dayton, O. Were the Japanese ever conquered?

No; Japanese soil has never been held by an enemy. When the hordes of Genghis Khan and his successors overran Central Europe, Russia, Persia, Afghanistan, India and other countries, encountered the Japanese, they were beaten back. In all its campaigns, as far as history shows, Japan has proved its superior military prowess. In the Boxer troubles in China, a few years ago, when the troops of various nationalities marched to the relief of Peking, the Japanese courage and endurance excited the admiration of the others in the expedition.

W. H. E., Mexico, N. Y., referring to a recent statement in THE MAIL BAG, estimating the number of words in the vocabulary of the average rural laborer, writes:

As a student of language and a teacher in a country school, I have given some attention to the language of illiterate country people and their children. I have written a list of more than a thousand nouns, not including proper nouns, which a farmer's boy of ten would use in conversation, even if he were without schooling. The list consists of names of domestic animals, poultry, beasts, birds, fishes, insects, parts of the body, etc.; farm crops, vegetables, fruits, trees, flowers, weeds and parts of the plant; buildings, parts of a building, materials, farm tools, parts of tools, furniture, kitchen utensils, clothing, food, etc.; natural phenomena, the simplest forms of land and water, the weather; time, weights, measures, etc.; social relations, relatives, trades, professions, officers, etc.; toys, games, sports and a few others. I also made a list of over 300 verbs in common use by children, also twenty-five prepositions. Adjectives, adverbs, etc., would bring the ordinary country child's speaking vocabulary up to at least 1,500 words not learned from books. The active questioning of the child, who is not satisfied till he knows the name of everything he sees, is paralleled in the savage child of nature who satisfies his craving for knowledge by naming all that comes under his observation. The scientist defines the facts of nature with an exact terminology. Each term embodies a theory or a series of observations. He may have a vocabulary of from twenty to fifty thousand words. As a matter of curiosity, I found, by a large number of averages, that I could define about twenty-five thousand of the words in Webster's International.

Dear Dr. Klopsch:—The Crown Encyclopedia arrived, free of charge, on time, and in good condition. I prize it highly. The maps alone are well worth the total cost. Your premiums are certainly the best yet.
Stratford, Canada. N. BRISBIN.

G. A. B., Wagoner, I. T., writes:
As to the priesthood of the King of Salem (Gen. 14:18), "Without father, without mother," etc. (lately discussed in the MAIL-BAG), we have the same words on one of the Telet-Amarna tablets. Ebed-tob says he was not confirmed or appointed to the position as prince of Salem by Pharaoh, but by the oracle of "the great King," the God whose sanctuary stood on Mount Moriah. It was not from his father or his mother he inherited his dignity. He was king of Jerusalem because he was the priest of its God. So with Melchizedek; he was King of Salem and "priest of the most high God," because he was the servant of the God of peace, neither his father or his mother exalted him to the position he occupied, but his own piety and obedience to a higher power.

Student, Paterson, N. J. Who was Ossian, and what are his works?

He is supposed to have been a Scottish warrior-bard, who lived in the third century. His poems were discovered (?) by James Mc Pherson in 1760, and are said to have been translated from ancient manuscript. Though very beautiful, and of a high literary order, they were discredited by the critics of that day, and have always been regarded as of doubtful authenticity.

Frederic de B., Cincinnati, O. Is it true that the name of Jane (and its variants) has been the synonym of misfortune in history? On what ground can such a statement be made?

Probably because several women of the name, who were prominent in history, have ended their lives very sadly. Among them were Lady Jane Grey, beheaded for treason; Jane Seymour, Jane Beaufort, Jeanne de Valois, Jeanne d'Albret, Jane of Hainault, Jane, Queen of Navarre, Jeanne la Pucelle (Joan of Arc), Jane II. of Naples, and several others.

Inquirer, Scranton, Pa. In what sense did the Apostle mean us to understand that the love of money was the root of all evil?

The translation does not give the real meaning. There are some evils which do not spring from that root. The Apostle's phrase would be clearer if it had been rendered as the Revisers give it: "The love of money is a root of all kinds of evil." He meant, evidently, that it bore all kinds of evil fruit rather than that all the evil in the world sprang from it.

C. D. L., Wilkes Barre, Pa. How did the name of Dives come to be associated with the rich man in the Gospels?

It means rich, and is only another way of indicating the man. It is the same as saying "the rich man and Lazarus." In giving the Parable, Christ simply spoke of him as a certain rich man, this, not as you suggest, indicating assurance or decision, but indefinitely. It is as when quoting from an author whose name he probably did not remember at the moment, Paul said (Acts 17:28), "as certain also of your own poets have said."

Jenny M. A., Brooklyn, N. Y. What was the origin of kissing under the mistletoe?

According to the old Norse legend, Balder, the Scandinavian Apollo, was slain by the blind god, Hoder, with a mistletoe arrow, given by Loki, the spirit of evil. Balder was restored to life, but the mistletoe forever after was placed under the care of Friga, and was never again to be an instrument of evil until it touched the earth. Hence it is always suspended from ceilings, and a kiss given and taken under it is the sign of peace and love, and not of mischief and hate.

A. P., Reading, Pa., writes: "Every true lover of peace and of the world's progress, on reading the news from the Far East, cannot fail to be impressed, as I have been, with the conviction that the Czar of Russia has lost the greatest opportunity of his life—such an opportunity as is seldom given to any man."

"Abraham Lincoln had the courage to sign the decree of Emancipation. Alexander II. did not hesitate to become the liberator of millions of Russian serfs. The present Emperor began well. He took the advice of Jean Bloch, the broad-minded, gentle-hearted, philosophic Jew, and he established the Peace Conference at The Hague as a tribunal for settling the quarrels of nations. Had he boldly asserted his royal prerogative and, in defiance of the 'war party,' sent the whole matter in dispute with Japan to The Hague, what would have been the result?"

"He would have been hailed as the greatest monarch of his time, and honored by all men. The Russian 'war party' would have sought holes to hide in, and to shut out the acclamations that would greet Nicholas' arrival. The Russian people would have idolized him. There is no real quarrel between them and the people of Japan. The Mikado, who seems to have a sense of the true fitness of things, would have heartily concurred. Russian commercial interests in Manchuria would have been taken care of, and the Hague Court unquestionably would have rendered a judgment satisfactory to both nations.

R. W., Lebanon, O. It must be a matter for the individual conscience. We may say that a thing which is harmless in itself, may be objectionable to many for various reasons, and therefore should be avoided.

the line firmly, and declare, "as for me and my house we will serve the Lord." There are many amusements open to him that are not in the category of objectionable amusements.

R. A. G. Vassar, Mich., writes:

Why is it that some of what consider themselves "leading dailies" in different parts of this country, appear to be trying to do with Russia and Japan what the ugly boys at school used to do with the little ones—place a chip on the shoulder of one and "dare" the other to knock it off? Is there any good and sufficient reason why the Hague Tribunal should not settle the differences between Russia and Japan? Is not that what it was organized for? We believe that Russia would be willing that it should be so decided, were it not for the officious intermeddling of mercenary wretches, who would like to see a war, if thereby they could coin the blood of their fellow-men into infamous dollars for their own consumption. In this twentieth century, any public man or office-holder, who would advocate unnecessary war, should be seized and placed in the front ranks to do the fighting.

C. E. V. A., Coolbaugh, Pa. If the good people of the Bowery Mission want to help their less fortunate brothers, why do they serve breakfast at such an unreasonable hour as 1 A.M.?

Because those who are to be helped under this special arrangement are not people who have comfortable beds, but unfortunate men and lads who have no money, no home, no lodging, and who are compelled by poverty to walk the streets at night. They are helped purposely at the hours when they are naturally most in need of warm food. What they do receive gives them strength and encouragement to seek work when daylight comes. Another reason is that we wish to exclude the regulars, who have their own homes, and who might take advantage of the Mission's hospitality if the breakfast hour were any time after five o'clock.

W. D. Blanchard, Linwood, Mass., asks:

Can you help me to find the poem which runs something like this:

"What the scanty soil denies
The harvest of the mind supplies."

It pertains to New England. Perhaps some of our readers may be able to give the information.

J. C. B., Monroe, Mich. Who is the prophet Mr. Bryan alludes to in his address before the Holland Society of New York, which you published Feb. 3, under the heading, "The Wickedness of War?"

He referred to Isaiah, who described the millennial reign. See Isa. 11:6.

How to Tell the Time by the Stars

BY E. P. MORSE

EXPLANATION.—The Earth's motion, and daily advance in its course around the Sun, make the stars gain on the Sun about 4 minutes or 1° every day, as they seem to revolve to the right around the North Pole. This gain amounts to 1 hour (15°) every 15 days, and 24 hours (360°) or one revolution, in a year. The circle 45° from North Pole is divided into 360°, or day-spaces, by lines numbered on the outside as day-lines. On the inside these are counted as four minute spaces, divided by longer day lines into groups of 5, which count 20 minutes. The 24 long lines 15 days apart, are hour-lines. It is also an hour from either 20-minute line to the next of same length. A month space is 2 hours: and any star will rise, cross meridian and set, 2 hours earlier a month hence than to-night. The zenith or overhead point is at the top, where the meridian or perpendicular line from the North Pole crosses the circle: and the north point in the horizon is at the bottom. When a day-line is perpendicular it is on the meridian; so is a star when directly above or below the Pole.

These day lines are so placed and numbered, that each on the day that it represents, will point across the card toward the position of the Sun on that day.

The triangle shows January 15, held in five positions as read in the lines when level. The North Star is found by the pointers in the Dipper (see arrow). It is exactly north only when above or below the North Pole (see dotted line), but it is so near that it is used for North Pole. When this line is level the North Star is at an average height, and as many degrees above the horizon as the observer is north of the equator.

Turn any day line to its perpendicular or meridian position above the Pole, and the stars will be shown in their mid-night positions for the day named as seen while looking north.

For any other hour of that night:—Roll this day point back to the right, or forward to the left, as many hour and minute spaces from the meridian as the time is before or after midnight.

To find the time of night by the stars:—Hold the card with the stars above or below the North Star as seen in the sky, and count the time spaces that the given day line is back of or beyond its perpendicular or midnight position.

inquirer. The lines are from Tennyson's Lord Arthur, and are as follows:

Are things are wrought by prayer
In this world dreams of Verdure let thy voice
Be like a fountain for me night and day:
I want men better than sheep or goats,
To nourish a blind life within the brain,
Knowing God, they lift not hands of prayer,
For themselves and those who call them friend!
I so the whole round world is every way
Bound by gold chains about the feet of God.

A CHRIST-LIKE LIFE ENDED

Rev. D. M. Heydrick, the Devoted and Indefatigable Friend of the Poor, Passes Away

MANY a poor and afflicted family, and many a Christian church in and around New York, have sustained a severe loss by the death of Rev. David M. Heydrick, which occurred on Feb. 15. Of few men might it be said, to the same extent, that like the Master he served so faithfully and devotedly, "he went about doing good." Pity it is that men so useful, so unselfish, cannot be kept with us always. But nature has its way with them as with others, and though, as the great Apostle said, to remain in the flesh is more needful for us, it is better for them that they depart to be with Jesus.

For several months past Mr. Heydrick showed signs that the end was approaching. Though his eyes were still bright and his spirit cheerful as of yore, it was noticed in his frequent visits to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office, that the elasticity of his step was gone, that his shoulders were bowed and his ruddy complexion had become sallow. He had passed his seventy-seventh birthday, and yet he would not spare himself, but in all weathers, he went out seeking the means of alleviating some one's trouble and ministering to the sick. After he was confined to his bed, during the first week of February, and his mind became feeble and wandering, his restlessness would frequently cause his beloved wife and daughter, who tenderly watched over him, to inquire what was troubling him. From his muttered words, they learned that he imagined himself in New York City and unable to get back to Brooklyn, where a family was in trouble and must be visited. "They will be evicted," he cried piteously, "unless I can take them the money for their rent." He would plead for his hat and coat that he might go out and get work for some man who was in need, and his distress at not being able to rise was painful to witness. But all such service in which his days, during many years, had passed, was over. Never more will those whom he so lovingly served profit by his ministrations. He rests from his labors and his works follow him.

Mr. Heydrick was a native of Flourentown, Pa. He was converted in early life, and joined the Presbyterian Church. His first services were given to the Sunday School, in which he had a large class of boys, whom he visited in their homes, and whom he encouraged and helped in their material and spiritual interests. It was obviously impossible to keep him in business or in any professional calling. Religion was with him, the all-engrossing concern in life. He was accordingly entered as a student for the ministry at Lafayette College, Easton, Pa., and after his graduation, took a course at Princeton. He had little more than commenced his ministerial career, when the War broke out, and he was irresistibly drawn into service for the sick and wounded. At first as a volunteer worker, and later in connection with the Christian Commission, he was in the field, on the march, and in the hospitals, comforting the sick, ministering to the dying, and helping every one whom he saw in need of help. His cheery manner, his unflinching faith, and his readiness to sacrifice his own ease and comfort in the interest of any sufferer, made him invaluable in that time of sorrow and mourning.

After the war, Mr. Heydrick settled in Brooklyn, and formed a congenial connection with the First Presbyterian Church, which gave him the opportunity of preaching, and of continuing the work that had become almost a passion with him, of personal service to the sick and troubled. Later, the Brooklyn City Mission was organized, and Mr. Heydrick was appointed on its staff. From that time until his death, he was a most active, devoted worker in its service, spending and being spent in labors for Christ. People naturally turned to him in any trouble, sure of finding sympathy and help. Heydrick was never to be met, at home or abroad, without some case on his hands of some one in affliction, whose burden he had made his own, and was trying to relieve. Now, it was a sick man whose rent was overdue, and Heydrick had told the landlord to let the man stay, and had become surety for the debt. The next day it would be some indigent aged Christian ladies for whom Heydrick had provided a home, and they had sent word to him that their larder was empty. Or, he had heard, that a young man was to be discharged from prison, and did not know how he could live honestly with the prison stain upon him. Heydrick wanted to provide him with a decent suit of clothes, and to find a place for him to work. Or, a family was in dire distress, because a son or a daughter had fallen into disgrace and had run away from home, and Heydrick was searching the dark places of the city to find and reclaim the missing one. Or, he had a number of sickly children, whom he was going to take to the country or the sea-beach for a day if he could find some one who would provide the funds. Every man's servant, no man led a busier life or had more to do.

The amount of money Mr. Heydrick spent every year in relieving the poor whom sickness and misfortune had placed in a crisis, is almost incredible. Where did he get it? It would have puzzled Mr. Heydrick himself to tell. He knew the highest source of the means; he held that God sent it all; but it reached him in the strangest ways, and through the most unlikely channels. The money, he used to say, will come as it is needed. Of that Mr. Heydrick was quite sure; but he had no more idea than a child of how or from whom it would come. Some morning he would be found starting away from his home without a cent in his pocket, having spent all he had in providing food or coal for some starving family, and with the obligation to pay by noon next day several accounts for rent, or funeral expenses, or some other necessity, aggregating one hundred or two hundred dollars, or some such seemingly unattainable sum. How did he expect to get it? he would be asked. He did not know, but he had committed it to the Lord. It would be all right. Two or three days later he would be seen hurrying along the street, his face bright and cheerful as usual, and, as usual, in need of money. Did he meet his obligations the other day? Oh, yes; there was a letter in his mail with fifty dollars in it from some man whom he had helped years ago, and who, thanks to his exertions, had become prosperous, and desired to show his gratitude to God and to Heydrick by a gift, to be used in helping someone else. And he had met a Christian merchant, who wanted to devote some money to the Lord's service, and did not know who needed it most, and was too busy to find out, so he had put a check or some bills in Heydrick's hand, asking him to spend it for him. Not infrequently men came to him saying, "I do not know how it is, but the impression came to me that you were in urgent need of money, so I have brought you this." One way or another the obligations would be met, and met on time, and Heydrick thanked God, knowing assuredly that it was to him that thanks were due.

So, day by day, he lived by faith, with a firm, unwavering belief that God is the Hearer and Answerer of prayer and that none who trust in him will lack any good thing.

His belief in prayer was unwavering. No matter how urgent the crisis, no matter how apparently necessary it was to take immediate action, he would do nothing until he had committed the matter in prayer to God. He was sure that time would be saved, and mistakes avoided by taking counsel with the Lord, and many instances could be quoted in which that belief proved to be right.

During his last illness, the cloud that bewildered him, and kept him from realizing his surroundings, frequently lifted, and then his faith was triumphant. On one of those occasions, he showed what was supporting him by quoting the prophet's assurance: "Fear not, for I have redeemed thee; I have called thee by thy name; thou art mine. When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee; and through the rivers they shall not overflow thee." On another occasion he asked his wife and daughter to sing his favorite hymn, "How Firm a Foundation" and then, "What a Friend we Have in Jesus," and "Nearer, my God, to Thee." The end was peaceful and almost joyous, for as the dying servant of God well knew, it was not the end, but the beginning of a better life than this. To him assuredly would the glad words be spoken; "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

THE ANGEL OF THE LEPERS

Mary Reed's Consecrated Life in India—The Mission to Lepers and its Beneficent Work

By MR. JOHN J. JACKSON, F.R.G.S.

NOT to those who need you, but to those who need you the most," was the motto suggested by John Wesley for foreign mission. This may emphatically be applied to the work of ministering to the bodily and spiritual needs of the outcast lepers of India and the East. It is not possible to conceive a human being reduced to a more terrible depth of misery and hopelessness than the destitute lepers of Eastern lands; stricken with an incurable and loathsome disease, which destroys its victim inch by inch; outcast by their kindred; regarded by their creed as under the special curse of their gods, it lums for men and for women, each having its own little church attached.

During the time it was my privilege to spend with her, we had touching services with her afflicted people. At the closing one, her women, who, with two or three exceptions, are all baptized Christians, testified their gratitude to God for having given them, as they expressed it, "so kind a mother." Another memorable service with the men resulted in five of them coming forward for instruction with a view to baptism and, quite recently, Miss Reed writes me that four out of these five are in her own class "standing well to their profession, and are living witnesses of the power of Christ in their lives."

When it is recalled that not a few of the lepers sheltered in the institution have escaped from the neighboring State of Nepal, where it is still the fate of the leper to be buried alive, it will be seen what a very real boon Miss Reed's work has proved to her fellow-sufferers. At the period of my visit, Miss Reed was about to set out for a period of rest. She has had twelve years of peculiarly painful and exhausting work, with only three brief furloughs, and she needs recuperation. The Mission has arranged for two other workers—Rev. C. W. De Souza and his wife—to take her place during her absence. Miss Reed has wonderful faith, and believes that it is in answer to the prayers of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and other Christian friends, that health and strength have been given her thus far to perform her arduous duties. She asks for a continued interest in their prayers that she may be permitted to return to the work to which God has so manifestly called her.

It was my privilege to spend Christmas with the lepers of our largest asylums, at Purulia, in Bengal. Here, on Christmas morning, I was permitted to take part in a service at which no fewer than seventy-seven lepers, men and women, were admitted into the membership of the Christian Church by baptism.

The Mission to Lepers is not national, but international; not denominational, but interdenominational. It exhibits Anglo-American union at its best, viz.: in active effort to relieve the suffering lepers and to rescue their helpless children. Need so extreme as theirs appeals alike to our Christian charity and to our common humanity. In our response we should recognize neither race nor creed. In this most Christlike form of missionary effort, America and Britain are working hand in hand.

There are few forms of Christian philanthropy in which a small outlay effects so much practical good as in this particular work. Thanks to the voluntary and unpaid services of the missionaries of many American and British societies who supervise the Society's work, the Mission to Lepers is able to provide the entire support of an adult leper for twenty-five dollars a year; while one of the rescued children can be supported and educated for twenty dollars. We believe that this aspect of the work will commend itself to American sympathizers.

We are glad to furnish names, information and, where possible, photographs of the sufferers, and it is my sincere hope that the kind-hearted readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will respond to the appeal that I here present in behalf of the most hopeless and helpless of our fellow-creatures.

Why He Loves The Christian Herald

The Calendar was received, and I am well pleased with it. I like THE CHRISTIAN HERALD very much; like the stand you take on temperance, as well as on the amusements, such as cards, dancing, etc., once considered as belonging to the world, but now indulged in by multitudes of professing Christians, and destroying (so it seems to me) the spirituality of the church. When THE CHRISTIAN HERALD comes and I read of all the good that is being done, I am greatly encouraged. I should be glad to have all my friends and neighbors read it, and will, by my influence, so far as I can, to increase its circulation.

S. A. V. JAMES R. CHERRY.

MISS MARY REED

may safely claimed that they are of all the most miserable, and, therefore, are the strongest claim upon the sympathy and help of American people.

The homeless lepers of India alone are numbered by thousands. In the majority of cases, they are without a roof to shelter them, or a friend to show them kindness. But it is just here that Christian missions step in and meet the need of the stricken sufferers. While at present no man skill can give physical healing to a leper, yet Christian missions are able to do for him everything short of a cure.

The Mission to Lepers in India and the East has the headquarters of which are at Exeter Hall, London, with an American Advisory Committee, of which Miss Lela Va of Guelph, Ontario, Canada, is Secretary, has, for nearly thirty years, been carrying on its Christlike work. Its operations have rapidly extended of recent years until to-day it is ministering to the needs of these poor sufferers in seventy-two states in India, China and Japan. Of these, thirty-three are institutions that have been built and are entirely supported by the Society. Fifteen of them are for the exclusive use of the rescue and education of the untainted children of lepers. The remaining stations are asylums to which the Society gives money, or in which it prosecutes Christian work. The contrast between the lot of the outcast leper in his homeless and starving existence and the provision made for him in a mission asylum is as light as day. Here he is welcomed to his life of isolation and misery; he is clothed, fed, medically relieved, and, above all, treated with kindness and sympathy, and pointed to Him who can release his soul from the leprosy of sin.

The sympathy of American Christians in this form of mission work has a special tie in the services of that devoted worker, Miss Mary Reed, who has long been Superintendent of the Asylum near the Mission to Lepers at Tagad Heights, on the borders of Nepal and Nepal. Beginning with a few outcast lepers sheltered in temporary huts, the work has developed under Miss Reed's leadership until there are now substantial asy-

MEN UNMADE*

Appetites that Unmake Men and Ruin Body and Soul

WHEN people speak of a self-made man—they usually mean a man who, without any of the advantages of education or family influence, has risen in the social scale and amassed a fortune. But there is another sense in which a man is made. It is when all the moral influences of birth and environment are at work to make him a self-indulgent brute; but by the grace of God, he learns to control his physical propensities, and becomes a strong and useful man. Alas, too, a man may be unmade. He may live for the passions he has in common with animals, and find his chief pleasure in eating and drinking and sexual pleasure. It is open to every man to cultivate his mind and seek spiritual development, or to care only for the enjoyments of his body. In a sense—he is his own master, and he may do what he will with himself—though he is warned that if he lives to the flesh he will reap corruption, and will have to give account of himself to God. Every young man and woman should recognize this fact and make a deliberate choice. The cost should be counted, for the upward path does cost. The downward path needs no effort. The weight of the flesh suffices for progress in that direction. But to rise—to become a man, in the best sense of the word—stern resolution and perpetual effort are necessary. The prize is worth the winning, but only those succeed who are in earnest and are prepared for self-denial.

The king made a great feast. It was not a wise thing to do, when a formidable army surrounded the city and was seeking to effect an entrance. The story goes that the besieging army had dug a trench half-way around the city, and only a few feet remained to be excavated to reach the river which flowed through it. When those few feet were removed, the river, instead of flowing through the city, would flow into the trench, and would leave its old bed dry. Then the soldiers, instead of having to batter down the walls, or force the gates, would march along the old bed of the river and under the great gates. The time chosen for the culmination of this strategy was the night of the feast, when the men whose duty it was to command the army of defence, would be feasting with their king. "In that night," says the record, "was Belshazzar the king of the Chaldeans slain." How many a man has lost his kingdom by such indulgence! His control of himself and his fortunes, his place in society, and his hope of heaven, have been all sacrificed by some debauch. "This could not happen to me," says one, but it may happen when the insidious habit of yielding to the craving for strong drink has once been formed.

Thou art found wanting. One of the most thrilling of Tolstoi's stories, and one that has had many a living fulfilment, is that of a young Russian noble, who, staying at the house of a relative, became enamored with a servant girl. By long persuasion and by the influence of his high position, he induced her to yield to his passion. As he was leaving to go to his regiment, he made her a very handsome present, and went his way. After several years he came into his title and estate and returned to that district. He was summoned soon after his return to sit on a jury in a murder case. The accused was a woman, and when she was brought into court he at once recognized the servant whom he had led astray. Her story was told in court. She had been discharged from her place when her disgrace was known; she had vainly sought for other employment; her family cast her off; and she had been in danger of starvation. Then she had joined the great army of the depraved, and when a man had been found murdered in the vile house in which she was living, she was charged with having robbed and killed him. The nobleman's conscience rose in self-accusation. It reminded him that but for his evil deed, the woman might then be in honorable employment as a trusted servant, or perhaps the wife of a peasant. That she was standing in the dock a criminal, was due to his own self-indulgence.

They drank wine. There is no way to ruin of body and soul so sure and swift as this. Some years ago a young lawyer, who was living in Philadelphia, began to drink at public dinners, and occasionally had wine at his own table. People began to notice that he was at times under its influence. The late Dr. Talmage was his pastor, and he visited the lawyer and begged him to abstain altogether. "There is no need," was the reply. "I do not care for it, and I can stop drinking whenever I want to do so." Dr. Talmage pleaded with him, but without success. Later on he went to him again, and received the same answer, "I can stop whenever I decide to do so." Not many months afterwards, in response to another appeal, he exclaimed in horror, "I cannot stop. I must have it or I shall die." He did have it, for no power could prevent it, and he died of delirium tremens. No one deliberately sets out to be a drunkard. The drunkard at the beginning of his course is in command of himself, and does not realize that he is a captive until the chains around him are too strong to be broken.

A Christian Indian's Appeal

About eighty years ago an Indian Prince was born in a hollow hemlock tree, somewhere in the Indian reservation of New York State. His name was Sunset. He was educated and accepted as an Indian preacher in the M. E. Church. Nearly thirty-five years have elapsed since I heard him deliver a temperance lecture. His lecture, if carried out by the white man, would solve the Indian problem. In substance, he said, "I preached to my people, and they accepted the Saviour and began a new life, when in came the white man with his evil habits, and destroyed my work. I saw no way of escape for them, but to convert the white man first, from his whiskey and his treachery to the red man." He was a powerful man and the vehemence of his address caused the blush of shame to cover the face of many who were guilty of dealing in the "mockery and raging" of wine and strong drink. His people are ruined now by strong drink. Away with it, or it will destroy the church. J. FLOMERFELT.

The Late Senator Hanna

IN the death of Marcus Alonzo Hanna, junior United States Senator from Ohio, who succumbed to an attack of typhoid fever, in Washington, February 15, the country loses one who has been prominently identified with public affairs for many years. During his long illness, the sympathy of the American people was expressed universally, quite regardless of political affiliations, and his death has called forth genuine sorrow everywhere. Mr. Hanna was a man widely esteemed for his sterling qualities, his fine abilities, his love of justice and fair-dealing for all classes, rich or poor. His geniality, his unfailing kindness and consideration for others, his many charitable deeds—for his heart and purse were ever open to the appeal of poverty—made him a favorite everywhere. Those who knew him most intimately, recognized in him a lover of mankind in the broadest sense, and one whose heart beat in sympathy with the common people.

He was born of humble parents in New Lisbon, O., in 1837, his father, Leonard Hanna, being a Quaker physician, who went into the grocery business when Mark was a boy of fifteen. From public school he went to Cleveland High School, and afterward to the Western Reserve College. At twenty he had begun his business career as a clerk in his father's employ. Next he was a traveling salesman, and in 1867, he became interested in the shipping firm of which, years afterward, he was the successful manager and principal stockholder. Step by step he progressed in prosperity, and his business interests multiplied. His first meeting with William McKinley was when the latter, then a young lawyer, was employed to defend a number of miners who were employed in Mr. Hanna's properties at Massillon. The friendship then begun, lasted throughout Mr. McKinley's life. Mark Hanna was his most trusted lieutenant in many campaigns and especially in the conduct of his Presidential canvass. He was a constant attendant at the bedside of the dying President in his last hours. From that time forward, it is said, Mr. Hanna never again took the same interest in politics he had done before. President McKinley's tragic fate and the splendid Christian fortitude he displayed to the end, made a deep impression on Mr. Hanna and influenced his whole subsequent life.

In recent years, Senator Hanna took an active interest in the affairs of the workingmen, and won their respect by his earnest efforts to harmonize their differences with the employers. He several times acted as arbitrator in strikes. He avowed publicly that he would rather be the instrument to unite capital and labor in friendly bonds than be President.

Mr. Hanna leaves a widow, one son and two daughters. His funeral was a public one, and the services in the Senate Chamber, were attended by the President, the Cabinet, Diplomatic Corps, Supreme Court Justices, Congressmen, and a great gathering of citizens. The interment took place at Cleveland, O.

A SINNER ENTRAPPED

Herod Held by His Sworn Promise

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

AT the height of John the Baptist's popularity, Herod had "feared him, knowing that he was a just man and a holy, and observed him: and when he heard him he did many things, and heard him gladly" (Matt. 6: 20). He became deeply impressed. But deep convictions, if they do not lead to a full surrender, leave a sinner just where he was before. Herod was living in adultery with his brother Philip's wife, and John faithfully rebuked him for his sin. Herod approved of John's doctrine, but when it touched himself he would not yield. He was not ready to "break off his sins by righteousness" (Dan. 4: 27), and so he added to his former sin the great sin of stopping a prophet's mouth by shutting up John in prison. Unwilling to repent himself, he hindered other men from repenting by preventing the preaching of the apostle of repentance; and therefore became responsible for the consequent loss to many precious souls. It was then that the temptation to doubt the Lord Jesus presented itself to John. He knew the Scripture, how it was written that Christ should preach deliverance unto the captives (Isa. 61: 1). Here was he a captive, and among all the wondrous works which Jesus did, he never released his faithful forerunner from prison.

John had not had the opportunity of learning the lesson of the cross, which, later on, Paul learned so well that he desired fellowship with Christ's sufferings and conformity with his death, if that by any means he might attain to the resurrection from the dead (Phil. 3: 10). The Lord's reply to John was, "Judge ye me by the works I do; are they not those which were prophesied of me?" But John, I have a word for thee; I cannot explain; facts will explain; but "Blessed is he which shall not be offended in me." It was the preparation, on God's side, for the martyrdom of the faithful forerunner. John was being ripened in the prison for the vocation which he had so gratefully accepted, of being "the friend of the Bridegroom which standeth and heareth him, and rejoiceth greatly because of the Bridegroom's voice." He had been in danger of being offended in Christ; this temptation over, he was ready for his martyrdom, and far more ready than if he had continued to be a popular preacher. He had learned his own nothingness far deeper.

And now Herod, the man who had trifled with God's rebukes through John, must also ripen, but for destruction. O how solemn it is that every one of us is ripening, day by day, either for heavenly glory or for "shame and everlasting contempt." While John saw the end of all his earthly honor, and even freedom of movement, there in the State prison, suffering for obeying God, Herod was free, and used his freedom to continue in sin without the discomfort and uneasiness produced by the rebuke of the man of God. The King's birthday was kept, feasting and merriment, presents and flattery, were the order of the day. The enemy arranged that when the King was just in the swing of the merriment, and under excitement, the pretty daughter of Herodias should perform a dance before the King.

This was just what suited Herod; he greatly admired it. The quick, graceful movements of the girl took his thoughts off troublesome subjects, and in his excitement he promised, with an oath, to give to her whatever she would ask. Herodias knew the man, and calculating on this result, she had schooled the girl beforehand. In her wicked anger that her sin had become a common talk since the rebuke of the stern prophet, she had set her heart on his death, and she had told her daughter to ask for the head of John the Baptist. The King was in a dilemma; he had feared the people and so had not taken away the prophet's life; the people "counted him as a prophet." And now Herodias demanded it, and he was bound by his oath. Either he must break with Herodias, and violate his oath; or he must brave the indignation of the people, and slay John. He was in a trap.

REAL ESTATE

NO MATTER WHERE IT IS

Do you want to sell your real estate or business?
 Do you want to sell it quickly and with the least possible expense?
 Do you want to sell it at a reasonable price instead of sacrificing a good portion of its value?
 Do you want it sold without publicity? If these are your wants, I can fill them.
 For eight years I have been filling these wants for people in every section of the country.
 The result is the largest real estate brokerage business in the world.
 I have offices in principal cities from Boston to San Francisco.
 I have hundreds of representatives throughout the country, closing deals.
 I am spending over $100,000 a year in advertising for the purpose of bringing the man who wants to buy in communication with the man who wants to sell.
 I have hundreds of testimonials from nearly every state in the Union, from people for whom I have made quick sales.
 I have, in fact, every kind of proof of my ability and facilities to sell any kind of real estate in any part of the country—proof that will convince the most skeptical.
 It doesn't matter what kind of a property you have; it doesn't matter whether it is worth $100 or $100,000, or in what state or territory it is located. If you will send me a description, including your lowest cash price, I will write you a letter of advice

For ACTIVE MEN

I want an energetic representative in every town in the United States. Good men can make lots of money working with me. I offer permanent, profitable, high-class employment

I believe I am offering the best opportunity for you to go into the Real Estate Business that has ever been offered. I have built up one of the largest real estate businesses in the world—a business that it will pay you to be connected with. I back up my representatives' work with an annual expenditure of more than $100,000 in strong, aggressive advertising in all the leading publications. One man (just appointed) earned, in a small town, $521 in commissions the first week, and, from present outlook, will soon be making $1,000 a month. If you will work earnestly and persistently, I see no reason why you cannot do as well; in fact, you will have a chance to make more money, as all my agents in the future will receive the direct benefit of my extensive and persistent advertising in making sales which are now made entirely through correspondence. Anyway, as no investment or expense of any kind is required on your part, it

This is one of a series of charming heads which we are giving away to introduce our brand of PURE BORAX. And after you have used Borax once, you won't require any inducement to buy a second box. These pictures represent the loveliest types of the modern American girl. The small half-tone illustration above only SUGGESTS their real charm.

To those who will send us a box top (and 4 cents in stamps to cover cost of mailing) from a lb. package of "20-MULE-TEAM BORAX"—which may be bought at any grocery or drug store—we will send, carefully packed, a fine, large reproduction, size 14 x 19, on heavy plate paper, for framing. These reproductions bear no advertising, and are got up as handsomely as any picture you would buy in an art store.

Ask for head No. 2, and address "Dept. A, Pacific Coast Borax Co., N. Y. City."

BORAX a Household Necessity

Everyone who values cleanliness and sweetness should use BORAX. In the toilet, bath, laundry, in every cleansing process of the home BORAX should be used. It doubles the power of soap and water to cleanse and purify. You will be astonished to see how much easier and cleaner you can wash things by adding a little Borax to the water. But be careful to get PURE Borax. Ask for "20-MULE-TEAM BRAND." IT'S PURE.

American Nurses for the Orient

DR. ANITA NEWCOMB MCGEE AND HER EX-ARMY NURSES ACCEPT SERVICE WITH JAPAN

AMERICAN nurses are proceeding to the seat of war in the Far East, and will assist and co-operate with the army nurses of Japan in caring for sick and wounded members of the Mikado's troops. Dr. Anita Newcomb McGee, who is the originator of this unique movement, is well known to persons interested in humanitarian work in the United States. During the Spanish-American war, she organized and was in charge of the United States Army Nurse Corps, holding the rank of Acting Assistant Surgeon of the United States Army—the only woman who ever held such a position. It was, moreover, largely through her efforts that Congress made the Nurse Corps of trained women a permanent part of the army.

Dr. McGee first took up the plan of having American nurses go to Japan as long ago as October, 1903, when the first serious prospect of war appeared. She offered her services of herself and her co-workers to the Japanese government at that time, and renewed the offer when war was actually declared. The officials at Tokio accepted gratefully, and have suggested that she come at once, with a few picked nurses of the highest degree of surgical skill, arranging for others to follow afterward.

All of the nurses who will go to the Flowery Kingdom will be women who have graduated from well-equipped American training schools for nurses, and who have had two or three years' arduous work in a hospital. They will be women who have also had large experience since graduation, either in the Philippine campaign in the Chinese campaign, at the time of the Boxer revolt. Indeed, the opportunity to secure such experienced nurses was the principal consideration that induced the Japanese Government to accept the offer from the United States, when other similar proffers were declined. Japan's Army has a large and well-equipped nurse corps, but it is made up, for the most part, of men who have had little or no experience under war conditions; hence the desirability of the assistance of graduate surgical nurses, with a wide range of experience.

Each American nurse who goes to the Land of the Rising Sun is pledged to remain at least six months. All go equipped with nursing uniforms of pongee silk, which is better adapted to field conditions than the ordinary white nursing costume. Field and traveling suits will include a brown coat, skirt and hat. All expenses of the nurses in Japan are to be paid by the Japanese Government; but for the cost of transportanurses of Japan, it is interesting to note that the latter constitute an organization of 800,000 members. It is not an independent organization, but an integral part of the Japanese Army, the members being paid by the Government. The Japanese institution, which has the direct patronage of the Emperor and Empress, devotes its principal efforts to the collection of money and supplies for relief work; but it also gives instruction in first aid, etc., to men who serve in the army. At Tokio, there is maintained a hospital where women nurses are trained, and several hundred have graduated, including many Japanese ladies of high position.

Japan's acceptance of this offer of service is a graceful compliment and recognition of the fine professional training and high ability of American women. But it is not the only instance in which the Mikado's Government has paid tribute to the talent of the Western Republic. In many of our leading educational institutions, there are young Japanese who have come here to study under American teachers, and not a few of the leading women of Japan to-day, are ladies who have enjoyed the privilege of a certain amount of American training, either here or in their own land under American preceptors. In these and many other ways the leading nation of the Orient, which has surprised the whole world by its remarkable development of energy on material and intellectual lines, has benefited by contact with Americans.

The American nurses, on arriving in the Orient, will proceed direct to Osaka, on the Inland Sea, which is the military medical base of the Japanese Army, and to which disabled troops come when sent home from the battlefield. Inasmuch as Japanese women nurses have never been sent outside their own country, it is probable that the American women also will for a time confine their work to Japanese territory. It is the intention of the Americans to study the Japanese language. That they will find many interesting coworkers is practically certain, since in the Chino-Japanese war the Mikado's Government had as many as 500 female nurses. WALDON FAWCETT.

tion to the seat of war, equipment and incidentals, a fund is now being raised by popular subscription. Each American nurse who enlists is assured that all expenses will be paid, but no salary is guaranteed. However, any money received from the Japanese Government, or from other sources, and which is not required to meet expenses, will be divided among the women in lieu of salary.

Since American women will toil side by side with the

Divine Telepathy

TEXT — ACTS 10: 11:

"And he saw heaven opened, and a certain vessel descending"

THEORY is often little more than the fine art of guessing. It is sometimes the way of concealing the fact that you do not know a thing, by using scientific language. It is the verbal means we have of dressing up speculation to make it look plausible. But there are certain cautions impossible to analyze, and learned answers only make the phenomena the more mysterious.

What is specific gravity? "That is the physical law," you answer, "which Isaac Newton discovered. Sitting one day under an overhanging tree branch, in his orchard, he felt a puff of wind upon his cheek. The overhanging branch swayed, and a fall pippin, like a lump of gold, dropped into his lap. Then the English sage began to wonder why that apple came down to earth, instead of flying away, as though it had the wings of a bird, toward the stars. As a result of these ponderings, Newton generalized all the causes of cohesion and gravitation which bind this earth into a compact mass, and called them specific gravity." But, my friend, with your learned answer you have not explained to me anything. In reference to the laws of physical cohesion you have only given to me two big words to express what I did not know before, and what I do not know now. "What is life?" I once asked a school professor. "What is the definition of life? Here is a body weighing 160 pounds. A bullet is fired out of an assassin's gun. One moment that body is alive; the next, it is dead. It weighed 160 pounds before the heart ceased to beat. It weighed 160 pounds after the breath had left the nostril. Give me a definition of life." "Why, life," answered the learned professor, "is nothing more nor less than the juxtaposition of the protoplasmatic molecules." His learned answer left the subject as great a mystery as ever.

Heavenly Influences

As in the material world, so in the mental and spiritual world, there are facts and phenomena which we know to be certainly true, though we cannot explain them. We must recognize rational results as such, although we cannot tell the "whys" and the "wherefores," nor the causes which produced these results. For instance: We are nearly all ready to grant the power of human telepathy, or the influence of one human mind upon another human mind, even at a distance. Sitting in public meeting some night, you exercise the power of will upon a person, and soon he will turn round and look at you, although that person could give no rational reason why he turned and looked. Indeed, so powerful sometimes is this influence of one human mind over another, that many students of criminology have come to the belief that some murderers who wield the dagger or aim the pistol may be merely the helpless and pliant instruments of unknown criminals, who have impelled them to commit their murderous deeds. Mesmerism, hypnotism, bewitchery, enchantment, are merely long names defining this mysterious power which, almost everywhere in the intellectual world, is beginning to be recognized, and men are asking whether it may not sometimes dethrone the supremacy of the individual will. George DuMaurier, in his famous book, deals with the hypnotic power one human mind may have over another mind. In that book, the English writer makes Svengali, a Polish Jew and a musical genius, by hypnotism transform a French laundress into a prima donna. He lays all Paris at her feet, although in her normal condition that young woman's voice was weak, and her ear could not recognize musical harmony from a discord.

As one human mind has an influence over another human mind, we also know that there is a spiritual telepathy. A subtle, mysterious influence which the other world exerts upon our own. Visional messages, as direct and unmistakable as that which came to Peter upon the housetop of Simon's house in Joppa, may also come to us. We may be unable to explain how the divine manifestations come to the human mind. God will speak to us now, if we will only let him, as surely as he spoke in many cases to his servants of old. If we look to God continually for guidance, to us, too, shall the promise be fulfilled: "Thine ears shall hear a word behind thee, saying, this is the way, walk ye in it." The purpose of this sermon is not to analyze the causes of divine telepathy, so much as to suggest ways in which God may be speaking to his children in these days.

Gospel telepathy, in the first place, comes to God's children as it did to Peter upon Simon's housetop, in broad daylight. By that I do not mean that they necessarily come to us as they did to Peter, at the sixth hour, or when the sun is highest in the meridian; but I do mean this: When God speaks to man, he speaks to him when he is rational, when he is wide awake, when his senses are on the alert, not when he is cooped up in some dark, deceitful retreat of a spiritualistic medium, or when he is tossing about on his couch at midnight in uneasy slumber, as the result of his digestive organs having been overloaded. There is a vision of the spirit and a vision of the flesh. There is a vision which comes from God, and one that is, like the nightmare, the product of our own brain under the disturbance of physical or mental conditions. There must be careful discrimination, lest we accept foolish fancies and mischievous impulses as the voice of God. That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the spirit is spirit.

Need of Discrimination

I speak very emphatically on this subject. As Charles Dickens had his Bleak House with its "Ghost's Walk," and Nathaniel Hawthorne his House of the Seven Gables, peopled with the evil spirits of past generations, unless we beware, we may have the temples of our minds filled with the weirdest fantasies, created entirely by our own unregulated imagination, or by evil associations, and not by the vision of God. What right has any man to apply to himself the ninety-first Psalm of David, as did a man some time ago in one of our Eastern cities? He pondered over these verses day in and day out: "For he shall give his angels charge over thee, to keep thee in all thy ways. They shall bear thee up in their hands, lest thou dash thy foot against a stone." Then, in order to demonstrate his belief in this saying, that man jumped from the top of a four-story building, and broke nearly every bone in his body. Do you suppose a vision like that came from God, or from the devil? What right has a man to imagine that he can get a vision from God, by using the Bible as a fetish or an amulet, opening it at random, and expecting the first verse his eye falls upon to be God's judgment in reference to some undecided matter, as I have known in my own experience of two or three people being in the habit of doing? What right has a man, when in doubt about any matter, to go to a fortune-teller, or to a sorcerer, or a professor of divination, and to regard the voice of a professional charlatan as the voice of God? Oh, no, my friends. God's voice is not heard in the dark-paneled rooms of sin. It is not heard from the lips of those who are leading dishonest lives. It is not heard amid fanatic vapors. When God speaks to man, he speaks as he did to Peter in Joppa, on the housetop at midnight, in broad daylight. He speaks to man in a rational way, and at a rational time.

There is a vision sent by God. There is also a Satanic telepathy. Christ, bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh, was tempted by the visions of sin as well as we. In the fourth chapter of Luke, we read that Satan took Jesus up to a high mountain, and in vision showed unto him all the kingdoms of the world, and said: "All this power will I give thee, and the glory of them, for that is delivered unto me; and to whomsoever I will, I will give it. If thou therefore wilt worship me, all shall be thine." Then Satan took Jesus to the pinnacle of the Temple, and asked him to cast himself down from thence, to prove that he was the Son of God. But Jesus, instead of obeying the Satanic vision, turned unto the devil and answered: "It is written, Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God." If a Being so pure and holy as our Lord was approached by temptation, and assailed by a tempter who based his wicked suggestions on passages of Scripture, how careful should we be, when a vision comes to us, as it came to Peter on the housetop, to make sure that the vision is heaven-sent for our guidance, and not a temptation from the enemy sent to our own destruction.

A Message at Sea

Divine telepathy, as with Peter, is often manifested with God's children after some great trial or sorrow, or earthly misfortune has come upon them. When the casket is placed in the home, it is apt to be felt, as Christ appeared unto Mary on the first Easter morn. It is very apt to be manifested vividly in times of bereavement, as it came to my companion with whom I journeyed through the Holy Land.

How to explain this manifestation I know not. I would give you the simple facts, and let you judge for yourself. We were en route from Beirut to Athens, by way of Smyrna. It was about three o'clock in the morning. I was awakened by my companion sobbing in his berth. "What is the matter, Troub?" I asked. "Oh," he answered, "something has happened at my sister's home. I had such a strange vision about it. I was not asleep, but this vision has come upon me as an overwhelming reality." "Nonsense, man!" I answered; "you are not a fanatic, are you? You were asleep, and had a bad dream; that is all." I did not believe in God's visions then as I do now. My friend said nothing; but that vision made such an impression upon him, that he took note of the time and the latitude and the longitude. We were then in. From Athens we went directly to Philadelphia. So overpowering was his conviction of the reality of that vision, that instead of going at once to his Philadelphia home, he stopped first at a friend's residence not far from where he lived. "How are the folks, said he? The friend answered, "What, did you not receive any message lately? Why your sister lost both her twin boys in one day. They both died of diphtheria within an hour of each other." My friend asked the time. They died about the same time the wonderful vision came to him in the middle of the Mediterranean Sea. I ask you not to give a human interpretation of that manifestation. You cannot. I cannot. From a human standpoint, was not that vision very strange? Can you interpret it from any supernatural cause?

But why be surprised at the incident I have related? You have heard of many similar occurrences. You had a divine vision in your own life, when the undertaker rudely broke into your home. When the doctor said she was dead, at first you were almost broken-hearted. You were like a mad man. You paced up and down the room, saying, "Oh, God, how can I get along without her? Oh, my God! my God! what shall I do?" Hardly had you uttered that agonizing prayer when like a benediction came into your soul. She seemed to come back to you. She seemed to put her arms about your neck, and to say with her old terms of endearment, "Husband, papa, sweetheart, son, I am all right. Christ has merely taken me away for a little while. I cannot come to you, but you shall come to me." Was it a dream? Was that message merely a satanic mockery? Or was it a divine vision, coming to you as one came to Peter on Simon's housetop. When you saw his joy and happiness, was it not the same kind of a divine vision as that which came to Saint John, when he came out, in Apocalypse, "Who are these which are arrayed in white robes, and whence came they? These are they which came out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb."

The divine telepathy often comes as a direct command for practical Gospel work. As Peter, on Simon's housetop, by his vision knew that Christ was sending him forth to carry the Gospel to all the world, whether Jew or Gentile, so by a divine vision we may know that God wants us to go forth to save this or that man, to do this or that work. We know it just the same as we know what our earthly employer wants us to do, when he gives us a bundle of checks and tells us to go and deposit them in the bank. By divine telepathy we know what God wants us to do in a spiritual way, the same as Captain Yount, an old California trapper, whom God wanted him to do something in a physical way. Rev. Dr. Bushnell tells this incident in one of his sermons, as it once was told to him by the hardy Westerner. One night, Captain Yount had a vision. It was in winter, and he saw a company of perishing in the mountains from cold and hunger. He noted," said Bushnell, "the very cast of the scenery, marked by a long perpendicular front of white cliffs. He saw the men cutting off what appeared to be tops, rising out of a deep gulf of snowdrift, and he noted the very features of the persons and the look of their particular dress." Well, to shorten a long story, Captain Yount the following day told one of his friends about this dream, and he described the scenery of the place where the emigrants were imprisoned in the snow. The friend said, "Yount, I know where that place is, you describe. It is in the Carson Valley Pass, of the Sierras. I have seen in that valley the scenery just as you have described it." What did Captain Yount do? He realized that this was a vision sent by God. It was a summons to a rescue. Although his friends laughed at his superstition, he collected a party of men and on a long journey of one hundred and fifty miles in the winter to Carson Valley Pass, and there they found a company of perishing emigrants, in exactly the position the vision had pictured them. As he did with Peter, and as he did with Captain Yount, God is bidding you to go forth to spiritually save this man and that man, to do this Gospel work and that Gospel work. With you to-day, you may hear the call. With your wide-open eyes, in broad daylight, you may see the divine vision.

This Gospel call for practical work is the more impressive and immanent because God's visions are not haphazard; they are never purposeless or meaningless dreams. They always have a very practical interpretation.

A MODERN GOOD SAMARITAN

THE STORY OF A WORKINGMAN WHO, HAVING BEEN RESCUED HIMSELF, IS NOW LABORING TO RESCUE OTHERS

ABOUT five weeks ago, a certain organization in Providence, R. I., telephoned to an address on Chestnut street, that there was a young man in their rooms so intoxicated that he could not get up. They wanted to know if anything could be done for him. He was under thirty years of age, came of a good family, and was well educated. The answer returned was: "Bring him along, drunk or sober." He was conducted to Chestnut street and left there, in charge of the man who had invited him. The place was an upholsterer's shop of very moderate proportions. A good deal of work was evidently done there by the hands of the proprietor, a busy man, but not too busy to follow the example of the Good Samaritan. He took the intoxicated man in hand, made him kneel down and ask God to save him; and then sent him to a clean lodging and put him to bed. Two days afterwards, sobered and refreshed, he returned to the upholsterer's shop and begged to be put on the way to a new life. Then, he made profession of conversion, and was approved by his conduct, that he is striving, in the strength of Christ, to fulfil his pledge.

More than four hundred such changes of character have begun in that shop. It is not surprising, therefore, that the organization in question, being embarrassed by the presence of such a specimen of humanity, sent him to a moral hospital, in which the treatment of so many others had proved successful. The proprietor of the shop is Albert E. Vining, an extremely modest man, who frankly confesses that he does not know how God can save a man like him, nearly fifty years of age, with scarcely any education, and with no money but that he earns by his daily labor and the help given him by Christian friends, who have seen what he is doing for the fallen. The secret of his work is faith in Christ, founded on his own experience. "If," he says, "Christ could save such a man as I was, there is no one he cannot save."

Nine ten years ago, Mr. Vining was in need of just such help as he is now extending to others. Low down and degraded, the victim of drunkenness and other vices, utterly discouraged, and so hopeless of ever being other than the wretched creature he was, he had determined to commit suicide. He had gone to work to do in the house of a Christian woman in Springfield, Mass. It occupied him for two hours, and during that time, the woman got his story from him. She found that he was practically an atheist. She insisted, however, that Christ could and would save him, if he was willing to be saved. He finally extracted a reluctant promise from him that he would offer a prayer for himself. To his own surprise, he felt himself inclined to go to church the next Sunday. As he left the building after the evening service, he resolved to visit the woman who had talked with him. He did so the following morning, and asked her if she would pray for him. He says he can never forget the sweetness of her voice when she said, "Yes," and invited him to come right in and kneel down with her. His heart was not in the prayer, and he was still in the darkness. It was not until ten days later that he finally, alone in his own room, and on his knees, felt the peace of God in his heart.

Since that time, he has felt it his duty to tell people what Christ has done for him. He has to earn his own livelihood, but in the evening, when weather permits, he goes to Market Square, and there, to as many as he can get to listen to him, he proclaims Jesus as one who can save to the uttermost, all who come to God by him. He exhibits himself as a living witness, and invites all to commit themselves to Christ in faith, assuring them of pardon and strength. Since he has lived in Providence, R. I., thousands have listened to his story, and his little shop has been the birthplace of many souls. When a man comes to him, tools are laid down and a sympathetic hand is held out. The case is stated—the case so appallingly common, of drink and gambling, and the swift path downward. "Do you want to be saved?" is the first question. "Are you willing to trust Christ to save you?" is the next. If affirmative answers are given, the applicant is bidden kneel down then and there, and ask Christ for salvation. Mr. Vining prays too, and then he proceeds to render what practical help he can. He keeps on hand a supply of tickets, one of which secures the man a good meal, and another a bed for the night, and one of each is given, and in addition a New Testament, with the earnest advice to read it. That is the beginning of the work which Mr. Vining follows up, regardless of the backsliding of his proteges, and without any faltering of faith. But, if a man will not kneel down and pray, nothing is done. Mr. Vining has no confidence in any other beginning. That, in his opinion, is the one and only way, "neither is there salvation in any other." "I have," he says, "no new methods of reaching lost men. This is the only method that has any kind of hope in it."

"The time to point a man to God," he explains, "is when he is 'down and out,' when he has not a friend in the world and is thoroughly disheartened. Get hold of a man in that condition and you have him at a crucial moment, and he appreciates Christian sympathy and Christian fellowship. He is likely to yield, be his heart never so hard." He instances a case in point where he obtained work for a poor man, and had great hopes of him. But temptation was too strong; the man got drunk and went all to pieces. Mr. Vining started him again and again; had to help him over a period of sickness, but finally had him on the right path. Now the man has his wife and child with him, and has kept straight for several months, and has family prayer night and morning.

In another case, the man was in prison. No one had been to see him in six months. He felt himself deserted. Mr. Vining talked to him through the bars, told him his Sovereign Remedy, and bade him come to his shop as soon as he obtained his liberty. It proved a hard case, but it came out right. The released prisoner and his wife are attending church regularly; and he is leading a good, honest life.

"I am not running a mission," Mr. Vining says, "but just trying to help men who need it." All his spare money goes in that way, and some friends who have witnessed his labor have come to his help with contributions at the rate of about $500 a year, to help him. He could use much more to advantage, but is chiefly concerned to have Christian people do the same kind of work in their own cities than to get help for his own.

A GOSPEL TALK IN THE WORKSHOP

When Peter looked off from Simon's housetop, he saw a great sheet let down from the heavens, filled with all manner of four-footed beasts of the earth and wild beasts, and creeping things, and fowls of the air. The vision was a symbol of the fact that Jesus died to save the Gentile as well as the Jew. Hardly had the vision ended when Peter heard a loud rapping at the lower gate. "Who is there? Who is there?" was asked. "I am messenger from Cornelius," is the answer. "I am not Jew, but a Gentile, sent by a holy angel to thee. Where thou come and tell him about Jesus Christ?" Then it was that Peter knew his vision was divine, and that he was called to a duty which he might have shrunk from, if he had not seen the preparatory vision. No longer was the offer of salvation to be made to the Jews only; no longer were the messengers of Christ to regard the Gentiles as common or unclean. So much the vision had taught him, and so Peter went with the men, and preached Christ to the Gentile centurion, and he found that the Gospel was the power of God unto salvation to the Gentile as well as to the Jew.

God's visions are never haphazard incongruities. When the good Ananias one day, in the city of Damascus, had the command in a vision that he should place his hands of holy ordination upon the bitterest enemy of the Christian disciples, he at first doubted the divine authenticity of the vision. Ananias looked up at first into the heavens, and in surprise, said: "Lord, I have been helped by many of this man, how much evil he hath done to the saints at Jerusalem." But hardly had the good Ananias entered the house to which God had directed him, when they brought to him a staggering, stumbling, blind man. It was Saul! Then Ananias knew that his vision was divine. So, oh man, and woman, the divine vision comes to you for practical Gospel work. You feel it. You know it. Why? Because while I speak, the answer arises before your mind, some one man, some one woman, some one child, you can save. You are like Peter standing upon the housetop. You are listening to the messenger of Cornelius calling you to carry the news of salvation to some waiting soul.

But there is still another fact about God's visions, which it would be well for us to dwell upon. The divine telepathy comes to the despised man's home as frequently as it does to the ruler's palace. Who was Peter's host at the house where he had this divine vision? He was Simon the tanner. He was in all probability the most despised man in all the coast capital at that time. Among the Jews, the dealer in cured hides of animals was looked upon as a social outcast. As men shrank from the leper, whose touch might communicate his loathsome disease to the healthy person, so the Jew shrank from contact with the tanner, whose presence in a home brought ceremonial contamination. The door of hospitality was always slammed shut in the face of the tanner.

By the old Jewish law, if a husband died without any children, his brother was compelled to marry the widow. But a widow was not compelled to marry that brother, if he was a tanner. Not even the Jewish law would compel a woman to suffer such an ignominy. If a man married a woman without telling her he was a tanner, she could have the matrimonial bonds instantly annulled, as soon as the deception was found out. Of course, there had to be tanners among the Jews; yet so bitterly were the tanners despised in ancient times, that by the Eastern law no tanner was allowed to build his tannery nearer to the outskirts of a town than fifty cubits. It was to this despised home that the heavenly vision came, opening the gate of the Christian church to the Gentile nations. Your home, O man, O woman, may be humble; it may be located in what the aristocratic people call the slums; it may even have been associated with the vicious pollution of society; but even there the voice from the heavenly mansions may be heard. "I came not," said the compassionate Saviour, "to call the righteous but sinners to repentance." You may be a social outcast as much shunned as Simon, the tanner, but in your house, too, you may hear a voice saying, "Come, now, and let us reason together, though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool."

One more thought is suggested by Peter's experience. This vision of the sheet came to Peter when he was, comparatively, a young man. It came to him, not only as a message of salvation, but also as a command, especially for young men and women, to go to work. The Apocalyptic visions of Saint John were entirely different. When John had his visions upon the Island of Patmos, he was a feeble patriarch of ninety. Most of his friends were in heaven. But the vision came to Peter while he was in the stalwart prime of manhood. He was then a young man in the thirties. My young friends, note the importance of this fact. It means that God is appealing to the young, and the physically stalwart, to consecrate our energy and vigor to his service. Something we may do for him before physical and mental decadence manifests itself; something we may do before we ourselves shall join the great "silent majority" beyond.

"I never hear my pastor preach," said a young girl, "but I am always filled with the desire to say 'Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?'" So I never read an account of the Joppa vision, but I always feel this is a message especially for me and for the young people to whom I speak, to do something. Oh, young men and young women, will you not be roused, as Peter was aroused, with the thought that you may become Gospel messengers to a sinful world? Will you not catch an inspiration for glorious Christian work, by standing upon the housetop of Simon the tanner?

REDEEMING A CITY

...What the Christian League of Philadelphia has Accomplished in the Moral Cleansing of the Slums

By C. Q. WRIGHT, Chaplain U. S. N.

UNTIL recently, Philadelphia had its "Five Points" and "Hell's Corner," its grafter's and thug's paradise, field of shame, unspeakable misery and "Darkest Africa." Thanks to the Christian League, led by the late Rev. Doctor Baker, Mr. George Griffiths, Rev. Charles H. Bond, and Mr. John H. Converse (of the Baldwin Locomotive works), there are no more such slums to be found in all the wide area of the City of Brotherly Love. And, while there are still dark spots, and here and there vicious colonies will develop, and many evils and misfortunes common to large cities flourish and defy the laws and better sentiment, there can be no doubt that the moral condition has been vastly improved. And a matter of equal moment and gratification is the fact that this powerful league continues to follow up its work, and aims to make it permanent; so that the success of the past serves as a prophecy of the future.

It is little more than nine years since the League began its work. It originated in the Presbyterian Social Union, in 1894, after an address by one of the leaders of the Princeton House work in the city slums, when the Outlook Committee of the Union, headed by Mr. George Griffiths, was sent out to make thorough personal investigation as to what could be done to aid in the work. The report of this committee, made in November, "revealed a most appalling condition of affairs in morally, politically, and sanitariously-congested districts, wholly given over to iniquity." In making his report, Mr. Griffiths said, "Some persons have been aware of this condition of affairs, but have not known what to do nor where to go. And so the thought grew upon the committee, that as 'The Union League' during the Civil War did so much to aid and strengthen the Government, so a Christian League might furnish a rallying centre, where all could make known their desires for a bettering of conditions and the enforcement of law. The Christian League was organized with the following objects in view:

1. To organize, and carry forward with vigor and enlarged power, in the city of Philadelphia, the great work committed in common to all Christians, co-operating therein with other societies wherever practicable.
2. To confer and act in concert with the civil authorities in all matters which may promote the moral and physical welfare of the people, especially in the suppression of vice and immorality, in public and in private.

3. To provide increased facilities, and to secure Christian workers for carrying on the work of the League in those parts of the city where the need is the greatest, and laborers are few.

4. To provide proper homes, especially in the country, for children surrounded in the city by the most depraving influences.

5. To devise ways and means to assist in the preservation and observance of the Lord's Day; to discourage the liquor traffic; to prevent the publication and sale of impure literature, and the exhibition of demoralizing pictures, and generally to promote such measures as will make and keep Philadelphia a Christian City in name and in fact.

At the meeting at which the Christian League was organized, representatives the betterment of places and people, and the extends hand of rescue to those 'in the depths' who sincerely yearn for a better life. The 'Kind Word' circular is freely distributed among them, offering temporary and permanent homes, etc. The same kindly feeling is exercised towards any unfortunates who are in distress." Many cases of reformations have taken place.

Certainly, any such organization might be proud to be able to boast, at the end of its third year: "The slums of Philadelphia, as they were, have passed away, and if the Christian League is sustained and aided, will never be allowed to return."

slum district known as 'The Coast' transformed into a safe and decent place, as it is to-day. This was done by insisting the co-operation of the civil authorities, and by firmly insisting that owners of properties, unlawfully used, should conform to the provisions of the law, by dispossessing disorderly tenants. The same methods were applied to similar conditions in other districts, with like results, and so it has come to pass that the City of Philadelphia has been purged of centres of vicious and demoralizing influences. This could not have been attained through sporadic efforts nor sensational methods. As, a direct result of this operative effort, many nuisances have been abated, unlawful and immoral practices broken up; neighborhoods have been greatly cleansed and improved, and compelling citizens relieved. The results also include the repaving of streets, repairs to bad walks, and a better class of dwellings for the poor, a reduction of cases between employer and employed; improvements in Chinatown, and many conversions among those who were without God and without hope. This work is now general. From all parts of the city come the appeals of those who seek relief from nuisance, insult or annoyance."

Mr. Griffith believes, that although so much has been accomplished, the League has an extensive and beneficent work still to do. In a recent interview, he said, "The first and foremost was the duty of constant watchfulness. Unless there was the utmost vigilance, the evils now in abeyance would assuredly reappear and begin again their old work. He cordially acknowledged the hearty co-operation the League had received from the civil authorities, who, recognizing that its members had no personal or political ends to serve, had availed themselves of the information they supplied, and had conferred with them on the best means of remedying the evils pointed out. Public sentiment has also been valuable. The League has the respect of the best citizens who are glad to see the reforms it has effected, and have confidence in its principles. By reporting evils to the League, they make it their agent in the suppression of practices and resorts which are a menace to the morals of the community.

Many letters have been received from other cities in which a similar work needs to be done, inquiring about the organization of the League.

from all the leading evangelical churches were present, and efficient committees were appointed, the late lamented Rev. George D. Baker, D.D., pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, was elected president; and Mr. George Griffiths, a prominent Philadelphia manufacturer, became chairman of the Executive Committee. Since that time the League has continued to steadily press its work, with signal success.

When work started in the slums, the attention of property owners was called to their responsibility, and to the law against the letting of property for immoral purposes, and it was soon found that this just and merciful method was proving successful, where prosecution and exposure would have failed. With respect to evil-doers themselves, the secretary's report says, "Let it be fully understood that the Christian League neither prosecutes nor persecutes. With the law in one hand and the Gospel in the other, it labors for

In November, 1896, a Chinese Mission School was established in Chinatown, by the Christian League, and a most excellent work is being accomplished.

The Chinese Mission is located at 929 Race St., in the midst of the large Chinese colony, under the charge of the Rev. Frederick Poole (Chinese Puh Tun Yin), the Rev. Mr. Lee and other helpers.

Many bright and trustworthy young Chinamen are being specially fitted for preaching the Gospel to their countrymen here and in China, where the Philadelphia converts are now supporting a missionary. The learned Mr. Lee, after training classes of converts among his countrymen in the United States, is about to return to Canton, to open a number of small missions where these can work.

An officer of the League says: "Against a high tide of vice and lawlessness that swept all before it, the Christian League directed its efforts with wisdom and determination, until that part of the old

THE BIGGEST FISHING NET IN THE WORLD

WHAT is probably the biggest fishing net in the world is used on the Delaware River. Ever since the middle of February, shad fishermen have been preparing for the opening of the season on the Delaware, getting the immense nets ready, caulking the boats, and preparing the houses in which the little army of fishermen are sheltered during the season. When the river is cleared of rubbish, so that the big net can be cast without being ripped to pieces during the process of hauling in, the fishermen are ready to begin work. The sight is so picturesque that hundreds go down to Gloucester to see the net cast. Captain Rice, the veteran shad fisherman, employs the services of seventy-five men, and these are assisted by eight horses during the hauling of the net. Two casts are made daily. It takes so long to cast the net and draw it in, that it is impossible to make more than two casts a day.

The huge net is two miles long. That is to say, the net itself is a mile long, and the ropes that support it are another mile in length, half a mile on either side of the net proper. After the net has been properly cast, it requires the united exertions of the men and the eight horses for one perspiring hour before the haul is brought near shore. Care has to be exercised in loading the great net on the boat, for if the strands are entangled, the cast will be a failure. When every foot is thrown from the boat, the signal is given to the haulers, and the work of dragging in is begun.

The haulers stand waist deep in the water. In the centre of the two lines stands Captain Rice, directing the men. Inch by inch, foot by foot, with the aid of the horses, the net hauls in the net. The captain encourages them with a monotonous sing-song that runs something like this:

"A little stronger pull on the left! Now, all together! Here she comes! Bring in boys! A-l-l-t-o-g-e-t-h-e-r, now boys."

After an almost interminable amount of pulling at an apparently endless rope, the net-work begins to show itself from the surface of the water. By and by the Delaware begins to look like a river ruffled by a tremendous hailstorm. The surface is churned into foam by the frantic efforts of thousands of fish to break through the net. The shad fish are able to get away through the wide meshes. Some of the shad escape by jumping bodily over the top of net. Slowly the net nears the shore, with its struggling mass of silvery shad. A boat is propelled into the middle of the mass, now in comparatively shallow water, and the fish are caught and thrown into the boat. They are usually so numerous that they can be picked up by hand from the meshes of the net. A good catch will be as many as three thousand shad at one haul, although the record haul is much greater.

COREA TO ACT AS JAPAN'S ALLY — PORT ARTHUR STILL HOLDS OUT

GEN. PUSYREWSK
Chief Command of the Czar's Asiatic Land Forces

RUSSIAN ARTILLERY AND COSSACKS IN THE YALU REGION

ADMIRAL SKRYDLOFF
Who will Command Russia's Asiatic Navy

CONFLICTING rumors of strategic movements on land, and daring, but apparently indecisive assaults by sea, have been the chief feature of the news from the seat of war in the Far East, during the week. Port Arthur, though repeatedly attacked by the Japanese fleet, has withstood its discouragement. Admiral Togo, having made several futile attempts to sink or capture the Russian vessels in the harbor, finally decided to blockade the comparatively narrow channel at the entrance.

As he did more or less effectually, on the night of Feb. 23. Tactics similar to those employed by Hobson when he sunk the Merrimac in the channel of Santiago harbor, were adopted by the Japanese. By Admiral Togo's orders, four old steamers were loaded with stones, oil and explosives, and, under their own steam, escorted by four torpedo boats, they steamed straight for the "fair-way" of the Port Arthur channel, which is some 250 fathoms wide. It was hoped, the night being dark and moonless, that the plan might be carried through successfully, undetected by the Russians, and the four hulks exploded and sunk in mid-channel, thus effectually "bottling up" the warships in the harbor. Watchful eyes on the stranded Russian battleship Retvizan, which lay fast on the rocks near the harbor entrance, noted the stealthy approach of the enemy, and the Retvizan's searchlights easily picked out the advancing ships. Then, almost simultaneously, the guns of the stranded battleship and those of the fort opened a hot fire on the Japanese fleet. All four of the blockading hulks were sunk by the Russian shells, and when morning dawned, the enemy's torpedo boats could be seen hastening back to the fleet, which lay safe beyond the reach of the guns of the fortress.

There were several conflicting accounts of this bold adventure, the Russians confidently claiming it as a repulse, while the Japanese, with equal confidence, asserted that they had accomplished their purpose in knocking the harbor mouth. Several subsequent attacks were made by the Japanese fleet, but though there was considerable firing on both sides the result seems to have been unimportant. It is still claimed by the Russians that the fortress of Port Arthur is capable of withstanding assaults, either by land or sea, and that its garrison is provisioned for a year, at least.

More important, if less spectacular, have been the land operations of the rival armies. Russian scouts in Korea, on Feb. 22, were reported as far south as Wonsan, and Cossacks had cut the telegraph wires as they advanced. On account of the severe winter weather, the land operations are necessarily slow, and weeks may elapse before the expected battle in Korea actually takes place. Correspondents are not allowed to be at the front with the Japanese troops at present, and the sources of information concerning Russian movements are unreliable and conflicting. It would seem, however, to be the plan of Japan to mass its forces in Korea south of Pyeng-Yang, where a stand will not improbably be made against the Russian advance. At the same time, there is a likelihood that an important engagement may be fought farther north, along or even beyond the Yalu.

In war, according to military experts, the improbable is the most likely thing to happen. Little thought seems to have been given to the probability of a Japanese invasion of Manchuria from any point north or south of Vladivostok; yet, if the latest reports cabled from London be reliable, this is just what has happened.

About Feb. 25, according to a dispatch from Yin-Kow, a large Japanese force, with light artillery, landed from transports at Possiet Bay, seventy miles south of Vladivostok, and took up its march inland. On the invaders reaching Hun-chuan, a large city in Manchuria, the Russian garrison is said to have retreated. Part of the Japanese force is marching on Kirin, 220 miles inland, and there is a panic among the population. Whether the purpose of the movement is to cut off Port Arthur and the peninsula by a land attack, or to advance upon Harbin, the Russian military headquarters, is at present unknown. Such a march in the depth of winter, over mountainous roads, might well have been regarded as impracticable. Yet the sturdy Japanese evidently considered it worth the effort. A large force in the rear of the Russian troops now in Korea might be able not only to cut off Vladivostok and Port Arthur, but to seriously imperil the Russians now operating near and south of the Yalu. As the report of this important movement is wholly uncorroborated, it must be received with reserve.

More reliable, apparently, is the report that Japan has landed a strong force of troops in the vicinity of Talien-Wan. This vanguard of her army of invasion in the peninsula is believed to be intended for land operations against Port Arthur. Over forty transports sailed recently from Ujina and other points in Japan, and there was still, on February 26, a great mass of troops awaiting shipment. London hears that, in view of this invasion of the peninsula in force, the Russians have practically evacuated Dalny, and will retire, if pressed, upon Harbin. Port Arthur, however, will be defended to the last.

Very important if true, is the news that Korea has decided to abandon her attitude of neutrality, and cast in her lot in the field with Japan. This change has doubtless been brought about by the pressure of Japanese influence at Seoul, where the Korean Minister of Finance, who was favorable to Russia, was lately dismissed from office and placed under arrest in a summary manner, that suggested sudden volve others, cannot now be determined. Meanwhile Korea will be to all intents and purposes, under a Japanese protectorate.

Russia is now striving, with the utmost energy, to strengthen her position in Manchuria by large reinforcements. When the crucial struggle comes, she will have in the field, Russian experts believe, an army of sufficient proportions, under the skilled leadership of General Kouropatkin, to halt the Japanese advance and retrieve all the reverses of the last few weeks. On despatching Kouropatkin to the East, the Czar sent to him a message, in the form of a manifesto to the army, conferring upon the General a decoration in brilliants. It states that "the hour has come when I must summon you to lead my valiant army and to defend the honor and dignity of Russia and her sovereign rights in the Far East." One correspondent credits the new commander with the boast that "no Japanese invader would ever be permitted to return alive to his own country!"

In order that its cause in Korea may not be misapprehended, the Japanese Government has issued to the various Powers interested, through their diplomatic representatives, a note giving new assurances that Japan has no purpose of acquiring territory in China, and also, giving a voluntary pledge to respect the integrity of Korea. This step was doubtless taken as an answer to the notification lately issued by Russia, that in view of events in Korea (referring to the hostility of the Koreans against Russia), she could no longer regard that country as neutral.

Following Russia's note came a declaration from Japan, which was equivalent to the establishment of a temporary protectorate in Korea. Although up to the present time there has been no indication that our missionaries in Korea have been in serious danger, it is not improbable that, as the war progresses, perils may threaten these consecrated workers. They suffered much in the Chino-Japanese war. The denominations represented are these:

Methodist, with stations at Chemulpho, Pyeng-Yang, and Seoul.
Presbyterian, with stations at Seoul, Fusan, Pyeng-Yang, Taku, and Syen Chun.
United States Minister Allen has taken all necessary steps for the welfare of the missionaries, and they will doubtless be removed from exposed positions to safe quarters, when necessary.

political expediency. This was followed by a startling rumor that the Emperor of Korea had been deposed, which seems to have been unfounded. It is asserted positively, however, that Japan has now wholly won over Korea, and that the Korean army of 17,000 troops, will join the Mikado's forces in operations against Russia. Whether the entrance of a third combatant will produce complications that may in

The Saloon and the Lord's Day

THERE is a bitter warfare being waged in New York and other cities of the country between the saloon and the Lord's Day. It is natural that there should be such a conflict, for they represent ideas diametrically opposed to each other. The saloon represents vice, crime, disease, suffering, failure, death; the Sabbath stands for health, happiness, virtue and life.

For eight or ten years, the liquor men of New York State have urged the passage of a law opening the saloons of New York City during certain hours on Sunday. Fortunately, thus far, this proposition has not met with legislative favor.

The liquor men are pushing their demand upon the present Legislature, and, strange to say, there are some good people—and even ministers of the Gospel—who are willing to accede to their demand. That there should be even a moment of debate on the subject speaks poorly for the low condition of the public conscience, which would so tolerate the saloon as to give it special privileges, and hold the Lord's Day so lightly as to be willing to give it over to its worst enemy.

The astounding part of this immoral proposition is that the Sunday opening is claimed in the interest of law and order, and even of good morals. It is called excise reform, home rule, or anything else that may sound well.

It is claimed that New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago, St. Louis, and other cities are cosmopolitan, and that there is a demand for open saloons on Sunday. It would be sad indeed if these were facts, but they are not. The real demand is by the liquor interest, which represents hundreds of millions of money, and which is fighting purely for the extra profit which would come from the privilege. The best people of all political parties not only do not want Sunday opening, but are positively opposed to it, and will resent with deep indignation and energy, any attempt to befriend the saloon at the expense of the Christian Sabbath.

The Protestant Churches have, almost all of them, put themselves on record as opposed to the proposition, and the Catholic Church, by its official councils, has taken positive ground against the Sunday saloon. Many who do not belong to any church, feel that it is the duty of society to restrict, rather than enlarge, the power of the saloon, and to hold sacred, rather than violate, the sanctity of the Lord's Day.

The eyes of the nation are on the conflict. Open saloons for New York City, would mean open saloons for cities all over this continent. It cannot be that the moral sense of our public men and our people will be so perverted as to allow so wicked a law to pass. The Christian Sabbath is not at stake. It is secure: it will stand till the end of time; but our free institutions are at stake. They can only exist by having underneath them the Sabbath and the principles that it represents. It would be bad policy and worse principle to exchange the Lord's Day for the saloon, the incarnation of every vice, the parent of every crime. Every true Christian should stand up and be counted in this warfare to maintain the right and overthrow the wrong.

A Hard Winter and the Poor

WE are now in the closing weeks of a phenomenally severe winter, which has brought much suffering in both city and country, especially among the poor. On every side one hears of unusual hardships endured by those who are least equipped to face the storms and blasts that have been experienced in many States these months past. Even in well-to-do homes, where there are many things to soften the rigors of the arctic season, there has been much discomfort. But in the countless homes of poverty, where the daily struggle for bread is at all times a precarious one, the winter has been most severely felt.

Have you "remembered the poor" during this hard winter? Have you sought out in your own vicinity some home of poverty, into which, by a little generous kindness, you might bring a gleam of comfort and cheer? Have you given a garment or two, a warm fire or a strengthening meal to the thinly-clad, the shivering, the hungry? Amid your various benefactions—and we know that all the readers of this journal are zealous in good works—have you remembered those needy ones near at hand? If you have done this, then you have the grateful consolation that, though it may have been in a humble and unostentatious way, you have helped to lessen the sum of the world's misery. The prayers of the "children of sorrow" will ascend in your behalf and the blessing will surely follow.

It is said that "the poor are the poor's best friends"—that those who have, themselves, felt the keen tooth of pinching hunger, are quickest to sympathize with others in want. To a great extent, this is true. There are few so utterly destitute of material comforts that they cannot extend a helping hand to some sister or brother still lower down on the scale of suffering. King Clovis gave the beggar his cloak when he had nothing else to give, and the humblest individual who shares his last coin or his frugal meal of dry bread with another, gives it with a heart and hand as royal and noble as those of a king.

Help your neighborhood poor. Search them out, and don't wait for societies and organizations to do it for you. Be your own almoner, and to those whom you help you will be as a Divine messenger. Your heart will be filled with unspeakable happiness, your sleep will be sweet, and your waking hours filled with the sunshine of heaven's approval, since you have done it "unto one of the least of these."

Manchuria's Value to the World

VERY little is known by the Western world concerning Manchuria, for the possession of which Russia is now contending, in the great war she has undertaken against Japan. In a recent communication to the State Department at Washington, United States Consul Miller, of New Chwang, China, gives much valuable information regarding this vast and practically unknown land. Harbin, the centre of Manchurian trade, is a city of 100,000 population, 60,000 being Russians, the remainder principally Chinese. The south-eastern branch of the great Siberian Railway passes through one thousand miles of Manchurian territory—"a country as continuously rich in agricultural qualities as can be found anywhere in the world." In the Liao Valley, where crop failures and famines are unknown, $10,000,000 in food products are exported annually. Of the 62,500 square miles drained by the Liao and its tributaries, the greater proportion is susceptible of cultivation. Beans, millet, alfalfa, and wheat, hogs, cattle, sheep and goats take the lead in the products of this ideal farming region. Modern agricultural machinery is practically unknown. Another equally rich section is the Sungari Valley, which has a climate like the Dakotas, and where kaoling or tall millet, wheat, beans, barley, oats, tobacco, hemp, corn and vegetables grow in abundance. This section has the finest possibilities for wheat production. Thirty bushels to the acre is an average crop. The natural market for all of these products is China, but reasonable development would lead to a gigantic export trade, which Russia doubtless has in view.

All indications point to the conclusion that the agricultural opening up of Manchuria, which must take place sooner or later, will be a revelation to the world. The enormous output in wheat and flour, of a territory so vast, is a problem which must affect the markets of Europe and America at no distant date. Harbin, which had not a single flouring mill three years ago, has now ten mills, with an estimated capacity of 4,600 barrels daily. Mills have been established at Moukden, Kirin, Port Arthur, and elsewhere. The price of wheat last season was 37 cents gold per bushel.

This great agricultural prize, for which Russia is striving, has only begun its record of development. What it will be ten years hence, when the questions of fuel, river and railroad transportation are satisfactorily adjusted, and when the enormous crop-bearing area is under the fullest cultivation, stimulated by the demand for foreign export, cannot even be estimated. It will become one of the greatest food-producing centres of the world.

Will the prize fall to Russia alone? Or will Manchuria be an "open door" for the world's trade, where all nations may share alike in the prospective benefits?

A Lesson of Life

WHEN, one by one, our friends and acquaintances drop out of our ken, and go to that bourne from which no traveler returns, we should be worse than foolish, if we did not try to get some light on our own path, from the survey of their completed lives. We can see what they lived for, what had been their objective in life, and see, too, whether such success as they achieved proved satisfactory to them. Some there are, whose lives end, as it appears to our short vision, prematurely, and from them no lesson of this kind can be learned; but when death comes at three score or later, the harvest has ripened, and we can estimate its value. Such a life was that of Rev. D. M. Heydrick, whose death was announced in this journal last week. His was a remarkable life, singularly consistent with the principles of the man, and eloquent with practical teaching. What do such lives have to say to us?

The most impressive fact is that at seventy-seven years of age, after living the same kind of life for more than sixty years, Mr. Heydrick declared his complete satisfaction with it. Not that he was satisfied with what he had done—no conscientious man is that—but he was satisfied with the principles which had been embodied in it and the ideals which he had kept before him. Yet he had not made money, he had not won fame, distinction, or power. His had been a life of self-sacrifice and of self-denial, for the benefit of others. He had toiled and suffered that other people might be a little happier and their burdens a little less heavy. He had comforted the sorrowing, had visited the sick, and had helped people who were poverty-stricken. Those were the chief occupations of his life, though he preached as he had opportunity, and neglected none of the Christian minister's duties. But his days, and often his nights, were spent in the service of people who were in need of help.

What reward did he receive? We doubt if he found much gratitude in the beneficiaries, and he certainly did not reap a harvest of riches. But at the close of his life, he was content; and if another half century had been added to it, he would have spent it in the same way.

Christ told us that he who would lose his life in following him, should find it; and our friend's career was a fulfilment of the promise. He had found the good in life—the joy of service. Like the Apostle Paul, he felt that he had "fought a good fight." This testimony of experience is very impressive. There are many whose end is clouded by disappointment, dissatisfaction and chagrin, who, like Ecclesiastes, declare that all is vanity, that when we do find a man who, at the four score, declares himself satisfied with the Master he has served, and the reward he has received, we may take note of the fact. It is not uncommon, save so few live such lives; but whenever men have lived them, the same testimony has been given. Let us learn the lesson, and embodying it in our own lives, in making the world a little brighter and a little better by our effort, learn in our own souls the fulness of the benediction of entering into the joy of our Lord.

Few people there are, who have not at some time in their lives heard and been touched by the words of this beautiful poem. It was written more than half a century ago, but the pleading sweetness of the words will never grow old. Henry Francis Lyte, the author, was born in Exeter, Scotland, more than one hundred years ago. When he had passed middle life, after having had charge of one church twenty-five years, his health so far failed that he was obliged to give up his work and seek a milder climate, his charge being in Devonshire, England. After preaching his farewell sermon, and administering the sacrament to his weeping people, he was taken to his little cottage home, where, in the evening, he composed this matchlessly pathetic and beautiful hymn.

Abide with me! fast falls the eventide,
The darkness deepens—Lord, with me abide.

He felt that he was slowly dying; he had bidden his beloved people good-bye, had partaken of the sacred elements with them for the last time, and now he was alone with his Father. He died at Nice, a few weeks after writing this hymn.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

Rochester's Disaster

FIRE has again worked havoc to the extent of millions of dollars in a great city. Early on the morning of February 26, two large dry-goods stores in Rochester, N. Y., were being fiercely, and were rapidly sending blazing fragments to start fires in adjoining buildings. The fire department so realized its inability to cope with a disaster so widespread, and appealed to Buffalo and Syracuse for assistance. Two engines, with their crews, were sent from each city, and arrived about five hours after the fire was discovered. Even with their help, the work of subduing the conflagration was slow and difficult. It was not until noon, after seven hours of hard fighting, that the fire was pronounced under control. Much hard work still remained to be done, and the whole fire department was engaged deluging the smoke-ruined ruins far into the night.

The first alarm was sent out by the watchman employed by the Rochester D. Goods Company. When he went to the elevator shaft about five o'clock in the morning, he heard a noise as if a fire had blown out, and immediately a-ments the presence of which are unsuspected until the fire of temptation or of judgment reveals them.

The fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is (1 Cor. 3: 13).

Killed at a Crossing

The Supreme Court of New York has just set aside a verdict for damages, given in the lower court, in the case of a woman who was killed at a railroad crossing at Schenectady, N. Y. It appeared that she lived near the crossing, and was familiar with the danger incurred from crossing the tracks in front of trains at that place. The Railroad Company contested the suit, on the ground that she walked in front of the train, and so near to it that the engineer could not stop the locomotive in time to save her. The suit turned on the question whether she looked up the track to see if a train was coming, ducing electricity, has been made by Mr. James H. Reid, of Newark, N. J. Hitherto the use of electricity has been curtailed by the cost of producing it. It has been necessary to have an engine to produce it, and many scientists have tried to solve the problem of divorcing steam from the process. Mr. Reid contends that he has solved the problem. He has discovered a carbon, which, when subjected to heat at a high degree, gives out electricity, which may be gathered on wires and carried to the place where it is needed. A test was made a few days ago, which appears to have established Mr. Reid's claims. The carbon, enclosed in an iron vessel or cell, was heated to the required degree, and immediately became active. A continuous stream of electricity was then produced, which was applied in various ways and fulfilled, apparently, all required conditions. The result astonished all the his homestead. People who knew the man and the place thought him foolish, for the pasturage was poor, and the soil would not repay cultivation. The herder said that all his life he had failed through living on land where there was no water, and he had chosen the mountain because there was plenty of water there. He lived all alone, and was glad to show hospitality to any travelers who came his way. One evening, a party of prospectors who had missed their road, stayed at his hut, and the herder agreed willingly to let them remain till morning. As they sat and talked before retiring, he told them about the curious appearance of the rocks after rain, and of the barren character of the soil. The prospectors were interested, and in the morning they examined the rocks the herder had described, and took some specimens away with them. A few weeks later they returned, and proposed to buy the mountain. The herder asked them five dollars an acre, and they agreed to pay that sum. The price was paid, and the prospectors found some men willing to advance money for machinery in return for a share in the venture. The company is now known as the Mount Morgan Mining Company, and it has set of flame rose in the shaft and soared to the upper floors. He had scarcely summoned the fire department when he learned that the adjoining store was on fire. The wires of the two buildings connected, and it is therefore a natural inference that the disaster had an electric origin. To the west was the marble block, consisting of older buildings, which were quickly ignited and destroyed. A new structure, supposed to be fireproof, called the Granite Building, was next in the path of the flames. The fire had possession of its ten floors almost simultaneously, and though the skeleton of the building did not burn, being of iron and concrete, all the goods and woodwork were completely destroyed. In the rear of these fine edifices were stables and other buildings, which were speedily kindled up. Altogether, fully two acres, the site of the finest commercial buildings in Rochester, were devastated, and property, believed to be worth three million dollars, destroyed. In a calamity like this, it is quickly demonstrated whether a building which is imposing and ornamental is as strong as it appears. The world has often been surprised by the result of a similar test being applied to character. That, too, often has in it elebefore she crossed. Her daughter, who was near her when she was killed, testified that the deceased stood still when she was two feet from the tracks and looked both ways before she attempted to cross. The Supreme Court Justice who pronounced the decision vindicating the Railroad Company, based it on the evidence given in her favor by her daughter. He said that if she looked, as her daughter said, she must have seen the approaching train and, therefore, she voluntarily took the risk of being run down, and was as guilty of negligence as if she had not looked at all. The decision was logical. To have knowledge, and to be aware of approaching danger, and yet not to act upon the knowledge, is the height of folly. And yet how many there are who have listened to the Gospel from childhood and have no doubt of their eternal danger, who make no effort to secure the safety so freely offered to them!

Then shall ye begin to say, We have eaten and drunk in thy presence and thou hast taught in our streets; but he shall say, I know ye not whence ye are; depart from me (Luke 13: 26).

A New Generator

A remarkable discovery, which promises to revolutionize the business of pro-

scientific observers, none of whom could detect any flaw in the test. It will, if it is genuine, reduce the expense of producing electricity by one-half. In these days when electricity is applied to so many purposes, it is impossible to exaggerate the value of the discovery, if it has really been made, of a material which gives it out freely, without the necessity for the use of costly and cumbrous machinery and exhausting labor. People will not be slow to take advantage of it, though in spiritual matters there are many who fail to see the wisdom of a similar course. They strive to win salvation by their works and their penances, and neglect the offer of it as a free gift.

To him that worketh not, but believeth on him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness (Rom. 4: 5).

A Mountain of Gold

A Queensland journal describes a mountain in the southeastern part of that country, which has had a pathetic history. Years ago, a poor herder had settled there, and had made a precarious livelihood by keeping a few cattle. He had fenced in the base of the mountain, and had fulfilled the conditions for making it already taken gold out of the mountain worth ten million dollars. The poor herder who had originally owned it, died in poverty. His chagrin when he learned the value of the possession which he had sold for so small a sum must have been very bitter. A similar discovery infinitely more terrible, will be made by many who are bartering their eternal life for the wealth and pleasure of this world.

Looking diligently lest any man fail of the grace of God . . . lest there be any profane person as Esau, who for one morsel of meat sold his birthright (Heb. 12: 15, 16).

BRIEF NOTES

Rev. E. Payson Hammond has conducted a series of services at New Brunswick, N. J. They were largely attended, and many young people as well as adults gave testimony to their faith.

Rev. Otto Stockmayer, of the Evangelical Church of Switzerland, has been holding meetings in New York. On Sunday he preached at the Gospel Tabernacle, of which Rev. A. B. Simpson is pastor. On week days, morning and evening, at the house of Mrs. Cortlandt de Peyster Field, he addressed meetings on the near approach of the second coming of Christ.

Union revival meetings have been held during last month at Owensboro, Ky., by Dr. L. W. Munhall. Methodist, Baptist, Presbyterian, and the Christian Church were all represented on the committee of management. The last meeting of the series was very remarkable. Fully three thousand persons attended.

THE LAD WHO HELPED THE LORD

Jesus Feeds the Five Thousand

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR MARCH 20
MATT. 14: 13-23

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT -- JOHN 6: 35:
JESUS SAID UNTO THEM, I AM THE BREAD OF LIFE

LET the lad who helped the Lord tell the story: "I was on my way to Jerusalem to become a son of the Law at the Passover, and we stopped at Capernaum to see and hear Jesus, the Nazarene wonder-worker. I was close beside him that day when his twelve apostles came in tired from preaching and healing all over Galilee. He was tired, too, for the same reason, and so he said, 'Come apart into the countryside and rest awhile.' Some said he was mostly heart tired, because his friend John the Baptizer had been wickedly killed by Herod. He got into a boat, with his apostles, and sailed away for rest. But we all watched his boat, and by and by we saw him land near Bethsaida and climb up on the green hillside, and then we all hurried around by land to hear more of his words and see more of his miracles. He always cared more for others than himself, and so when we scrambled up the hill, I heard him say, as I got near, 'They are as sheep without a shepherd.' And so he rose to greet us and be our good Shepherd. He welcomed us with sweet words about his kingdom, and healed sick ones we had brought along. Near sunset, he saw the people were hungry, and knew they had followed him so eagerly that most of them had forgotten to bring any food with them. 'Whence shall we buy bread that we may eat?' he said. One of his apostles said, 'Two hundred days' wages would not buy enough to give every one so much as a bite.' Jesus said, 'Give ye them to eat.' One of his apostles, looking around in a helpless way, saw in my basket what I had brought along to eat in my journey to Jerusalem. He said in a faint voice, as if it was hardly worth while, 'There is lad here which hath five barley loaves and two small fishes, but what are they among so many?' But Jesus answered firmly, 'Bring them hither to me.' Oh, how glad I was to help the friend of children! To have him use my plain loaves and my little dried fishes, what joy, what honor! The Lord had need of me, and so I could not be lost in the crowd though I was least of all. While I stood before him he said, 'Make the people sit down in flower-beds of fifty people each.' It was Nisan, the month of flowers, and they did look like beautiful flower-beds around their kind Gardener as they sat down cross-legged in circles and rows, in their many-colored garments, on the soft green of the spring grass, their turbaned heads in their excitement tossing like flowers in the wind. When the apostles had arranged the crowd they came to get the bread and distribute it. Jesus laid his blessed hands on my poor bread and looked up and prayed, and then he broke the bread and divided the fish; but like the widow's cruise of oil in my Bible story, it grew no less for all he gave away. The apostles all had a way of their own.

A TYPICAL JEWISH BOY

"Everybody had all they wanted to eat. Jesus had made my basket like the fountain that grows to a river. When all had enough, Jesus would not allow anything to be wasted, and so he said: 'Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost,' and there was a big basketful for everyone of his twelve apostles, more for everyone of them than all I had at first. The people said on every side, 'This Jesus is surely the promised Messiah, the prophet like unto Moses, for like Moses, he has given us to-day bread from heaven.'"

Dr. Alexander McLaren writes of the contrast between this lesson and the preceding one:

Illustration and Application

"What a contrast between Herod's banquet and this table spread in the wilderness! At the one, the heavy air reeked with the fumes of wine and blood; and lust, drunkenness, and murder were guests. At the other, the cool evening breeze from the lake played round the companies on the sweet, green grass. The fare was coarse and wholesome, the eaters awoke into some dim recognition of the giver, and he himself revealed as lovingly careful of humblest needs, as divinely able to satisfy these, and as, in deepest truth, the Bread of the world."

This story suggests: 1. A wholesome sense of our own weakness—"What are they among so many?" 2. Consecration—"Bring them hither to me." 3. Work for others—"Give ye—gather up."

1. What are these? We can make no headway in our own salvation, or the salvation of others, until we realize that our own efforts, and our own merits are as utterly inadequate as were the barley loaves in themselves for feeding the multitude. To erect a tall building securely, the first work is to dig out enough ground to lay a secure foundation. To develop high usefulness, we must first dig out pride and other selfish rubbish, and so make room for the Rock. Every successful Christian life has begun in a sense of self-distrust, that has made way for trust in God. "No confidence in the flesh"—that digging out is the best preparation for strong confidence in God. Thus Moses laid the foundation of his great life. When called to be Israel's deliverer, he who was to be the greatest of purely human characters, cried: "Who am I that I should go unto Pharaoh?" (Exodus 3: 11). Any one who had felt equal to such a work would have proved himself unworthy of it. Gideon's like distrust of himself is pictured in a figure peculiarly significant in connection with this lesson, the barley cake that in his dream rolled into the tent of Midian, and overthrew the camp of his mighty foes. Solomon at nineteen, when the pride of youth is apt to be overstrong, called to rule over the kingdom, exclaimed: "I am but a little child." King David, before him, had said: "My soul is even as a weaned child." Jeremiah, called to prophesy as one of the two greatest of prophets, exclaimed: "Ah, Lord God, I cannot speak, for I am a child." All these and more of the world's foremost men illustrate the saying, "When I am weak, then am I strong." The first step in every successful work for God is realization of the insufficiency of the barley loaves of human powers to accomplish the work that God requires. "What are these in the presence of the heart-hunger of the multitudes we are called to save?"

LOVE PRAYER SONG GIFTS WORDS

2. Bring them hither to me. Consecration shall make our barley loaves sufficient to feed the multitude. Consecration shall make Gideon, the barley cake, the conqueror of Midian. Not from some rich man's feast did Christ take the supply he would multiply to feed the five thousand, but from a poor boy's basket of barley bread and dried fish. "These," plus Christ, were enough. He who spoke despairingly of the few barley loaves forgot to add Christ. The boy brought his little all in full consecration. His weakness became completeness in another's greater strength. Whether it be five barley loaves, or five pebbles out of the brook, God's blessing makes them sufficient.

As our Bible story is of a lad that Jesus used, let our chief illustration be the story of a girl that helped the Lord in giving the bread of life to rough men. This Winnie Morris was the child of a British workman. Daily she brought to her father his dinner at his post in the chalk quarries. She passed other workmen who had only cold dinners, and who grieved her by their profanity and their drinking habits, for she was a Christian girl. At last she thought out a plan to do them good. She had a box of savings, and got her mothplied; but lady means loaf-giver, and she was that in the truest sense, God's loaf-giver.

Every one has some talent in greater or less degree. The power of song, the gift of conversation, strength of personal influence, power of public address, aptness to teach, over young or old, that may be made the means of bringing the bread of life to men if first the possessor of that talent hears and heeds Christ's call, "Bring them hither to me."

3. Give ye—gather up. Work for others with resulting gain and growth to ourselves is the third stage in the Christian's development, following the sense of unworthiness and the habit of consecration. "Give ye—gather up"—the epitome of every Christian worker's experience. Religion, it has been well said, is a commodity of which the more you export the more you have at home. The more you give the more you have. "There is that scattereth and yet increaseth." It is the seed that is sown that multiplies.

Years ago a young English artist painted a picture which he hoped would find a place in the Academy. It was a picture of a lonely woman struggling up a street on a stormy night, the sleet driven by the wind into her eyes, a little baby at her bosom. Doors and windows were closed in her face. The picture was called "Homeless." As the artist painted it, and the artist's imagination filled his eyes, it seemed to come to him as a living reality, and he brushed down and said, "God help me! why don't I go and help people themselves, instead of painting pictures of them." Then and there he consecrated himself to God. He went to Oxford University, and in due course entered the ministry. He worked in the slums of one city for two years, then went to Durham for five years. "I am not going to stop with you any longer," he said to a fellow-worker; "I want to go to the part of the world where men seem to be most lost. I have come to the conclusion that East Africa is the place where men are most wanted." One day there came a message from the Secretary of the Church Missionary Society, asking whether he would be willing to be the leader of a party going to Uganda. He consented, and was consecrated as Bishop Tucker of Uganda, in succession to Hannington and Parker. He is feeding the hungry multitudes with the bread of life.

da. He consented, and was consecrated as Bishop Tucker of Uganda, in succession to Hannington and Parker. He is feeding the hungry multitudes with the bread of life.

This miracle was after all by a text for Jesus to preach from out himself as the bread of life. His lowly incarnation he became not alone a "lad," but the very barley loaves that feed the multitude. He is also the fish, as so often pictured mystically in the catacombs, the full title Jesus, Son of God, Saviour, in its Latin initials, forming the Greek word for fish, ichthus. On this we feed spiritually in that a supernatural influence and life from him comes into our souls. One of the characteristics of a human character that has never fully moulded his character. He came into my life like an influence. But of Christ we can say "He came into my life as new life."

There is a loaf of bread, one thousand five hundred years old, which was found in the tomb of Mentuhotep, who died in Egypt 2500 B.C. It is now in the Museum of Berlin. This loaf of bread is dark brown in color. Inside are many large holes. Probably this part of the bread long since fell into dust; but much of the loaf still remains in the shape of whole kernels and pieces of grain. Examination proves that the loaf was made of barley, and the seeds were only rudely crushed and not sifted. It was not baked in a oven, but after being kneaded into dough by the addition of water was placed between two heated stones, or was put on a plate and laid upon the red-hot coals. This is perhaps the best loaf of bread in the world, but it is of no value except as a curiosity. Human characters for the most part cease to feed the life of men after a century or so has past. But Christ is living bread, ever new and nourishing to all who receive him.

Gather up the fragments. "Do thy little, though it be dreariness and drudgery: They whom Christ apostles made 'Gathered fragments' when he bade."

Only a word for the Master, Lovingly, quietly said. Only a word! Yet the Master heard, And fainting hearts were fed. Only a look of remembrance, Sorrowful, gentle, and deep. Only a look! Yet the strong man shook, And he went alone to weep.

"HE SAID, BRING THEM HITHER TO ME"

er to allow her to spend a shilling in meat, out of which her mother was to make some meat patties, such as she often carried to her father. The next day she carried in her basket, in addition to her father's dinner, six of these plump, well-baked patties. Before starting, she had wrapped each of these carefully, and asked God to bless what she was going to do. The rough men were both surprised and pleased, when Winnie stopped in passing, and handed each of the six a tiny bundle, saying it was something nice for dinner. They thanked her, and she passed on quickly, and later went home another way. Meantime the workmen ate their patties, and afterwards began to talk of these kind presents. "Look here, mates, what mine was wrapped up in." It was a leaflet, entitled "The Swearer's Prayer." Then the others hunted about to find their wrappers. Each one was "bread of life." Winnie wondered how the men would receive her message. On the next Sunday she found out, for two of the men came to the chapel her father attended, and others of the group came later, and let us hope learned to feed daily on the Bread that cometh down from heaven. Winnie was not of the class to whom the title "lady" is commonly apbut after being kneaded into dough by the addition of water was placed between two heated stones, or was put on a plate and laid upon the red-hot coals. This is perhaps the best loaf of bread in the world, but it is of no value except as a curiosity. Human characters for the most part cease to feed the life of men after a century or so has past. But Christ is living bread, ever new and nourishing to all who receive him.

The Church Sociable

THE function familiarly termed a church sociable, is an entertainment which combines the characteristics of a friendly gathering in a private house, and a reception given to strangers in a public place. Where congregations are widely scattered, their members separated by the magnificent distances of a large city, almost the only method of bringing them together in an informal and neighborly fashion, is found in the church sociable. It may be extremely pleasant or extremely stiff. Its success or failure depend largely upon the tact and cordial interest of the reception committee, and, in a lesser degree, on the genial support of the minister and consistory. Primarily, the object of such a gathering is to make strangers welcome, introduce them to one another and to older members of the church, and give them a feeling of being at home in the new environment. City life is nomadic. At this period of the year, hundreds of people who live in towns, and not a few who live in the suburbs, are anxiously canvassing the question of some change of abode. Tenant life does not incline people to strike their roots very deeply into the soil. Where landlords are grudging and reluctant in the matter of repairs; where plumbing is as unstable as running water; where pipes freeze and burst at the most inconvenient moments, and diphtheria is feared from imperfect drainage, tenants move without compunction.

No city minister feels at all certain that he will have the same congregation from one twelfth-month to another. Often he mournfully deplores the fact that he preaches to a crowd of respectable tramps and transients, yet, nevertheless, he girds up his loins and goes on with his work. Aided valiantly by the consistory and the Ladies' Aid Society, and the Young People's Guild, and whatever organizations he may have at hand, he attempts the task of welding his people firmly together, binding the new to the old with cords of love, even the bonds of a man. To this end, the church social is invoked as a useful auxiliary in the effort.

There should always be arranged for such an affair, an interesting programme of music or recitations, not too long and not too artistic, but popular, and likely to please the uneducated as well as the critical taste. Members of the church who live near by, will but lend rugs, lamps and palms to give the church parlor an inviting look of hominess, it will be all the better. Refreshments, though very simple, are indispensable, as people thaw out over a cup of coffee and a bit of cake much sooner than in any other way. From time immemorial, hospitality and good fellowship have expressed themselves in something to eat and drink, and the modern luncheon is the equivalent for the bread and salt of the primeval desert.

In the country, the conditions are very much more favorable to sociability. There people know not only one another, but all the forefathers and kindred, near or remote. Less is going on. The sociable is more of an event. People have a common stock of traditions and interests, and are apt to meet on a common ground of friendliness. Even so, the church sociable binds them a little closer together, bringing it does the element of diversion and recreation into hard-working lives. The sociable should be something which should make people go to the prayer-meeting with greater zest and add warmth to the hand-clasp when they meet during the week or on the Sabbath. A patronizing attitude toward it, or a distinct dislike to joining in a union which calls together all the people in the church, without regard to education, poverty or wealth, is wholly out of place. We have occasionally seen in the faces of certain church-goers, a look of aversion or of condescension, when asked whether they proposed to attend the next sociable. This is really wrong, and adds a fearful amount of discouragement to the uphill path of the conscientious pastor.

A Beautiful Life

"Yes, hers was a beautiful life," said an old man, speaking of one who had gone home. "It was beautiful in its opportunities. She was in a position where she could act as a leader, where many looked up to her, and where she could dispense benefits. Beautiful, too, in its ministry, first to aged parents, then to her own beloved family group. Very beautiful her life was in its cheerfulness. When I think of Eva, I remember her merry laugh, her way of singing about the house, and her knack of seeing the fun in everything."

MONARCHS THAT NEED NO CROWNS

Kings and queens in Toyland, free and brave in Joyland,
What heed they of aught beyond this small nursery's happy bound.
Merry they in wildest weather, little kings and queens together.

The old man stopped, and I thought of the character he had depicted. Cheerful, winsome, swift in service, and rich in opportunities.

Yes, it was a beautiful life, and a life like it is in the reach of every one who accepts the days and hours as they come, as gifts of a Divine Father.

The Blooming Bulbs

A FEW weeks ago, the dark, unsightly bulbs gave slight promise of beauty, but to-day, as spring comes coyly forward, they are showing rare beauty and loveliness.

The hyacinths are peculiarly attractive, so rich in coloring, so fragrant and spicy in sweetness, and so perfect in their exquisite clusters. To have a window filled with hyacinths and jonquils is to have a vision of delight all day long.

Flowers grow more luxuriantly for some people than for others, but is it not because all do not give the same loving thought and care to them, that all cannot have the same results? A little study of soils, of atmosphere, of the individual likings of different plants, is necessary if one would have a window-garden of which she can be proud. Flower-culture is like every other culture, it cannot lead to success unless great pains are taken.

A Long Term of Service

In the morning newspapers of New York, the other day, there appeared a line giving the name and death of Ellen Fleming, aged seventy-eight. These words were added, "This notice is published in affectionate esteem by the fourth generation of the family she so loyally served for fifty-four years."

We live in a period of ferment and unrest in domestic conditions. The tenure by which women hold the maids who assist them in housewifery is slight as a cobweb. Yet, here and there are found shining exceptions, such as this of Ellen Fleming, and of the people whose roof-tree was hers for fifty-four years. Think of the births and marriages and deaths she saw in that household, of the joy and sorrow she shared, of the fealty of a long life spent in a relation of entire mutual respect and friendliness. Such a testimony as that embodied in the brief notice epitomizes something most precious, and lifts before our eyes a high ideal, which some have reached, and others are reaching.

That we keep our houses too hot is undoubtedly true. We enervate ourselves by the overheated atmosphere in which, what with steam and dry air furnaces and roaring fires in the big stove, we give battle to old winter.

A young woman, five years ago, was discovered by her family physician to have tuberculosis, and his opinion was confirmed by specialists with whom he consulted. Thirty years ago, her doom would have been sealed. A few months of dire suffering and swift decay, and the grave would have received her emaciated frame. It is different now. She was sent to the uplands and ordered to live outdoors. Presently she crossed the ocean and went to Switzerland. There, at a high altitude, she lived in the open air, drank milk, ate simple food, taking several meals a day, four at least, and battling against her malady by the aid of Nature's restoratives, fresh pure air, and plenty of rest. To-day she is well, and has before her a life of usefulness.

Most of us, who suffer from colds and similar disturbances, could be cured quickly if we lived more simply and avoided overheated houses.

A Cup of Tea

Considering how stimulating and helpful is a good cup of tea, it is a pity that we are so often put off with a poor one.

To begin with, good tea cannot be made with a poor brand. Buy a good quality of tea, of whatever variety you prefer. In the end, the expensive kinds outlast the cheaper, for they are stronger and require less for a brew.

Tea must be steeped, not boiled, and, as a rule, two minutes in freshly boiled water is quite enough to insure excellence. Do not use water that has simmered for hours on a stove. That will make your tea flat and flavorless. Have cold water to begin with. Set on the kettle and bring it to a rattling boiling point. Use an earthen teapot.

Scald it to make it hot. Then drop in the tea, a teaspoonful for each cup and one for the pot is the time-honored rule; but in Ceylon and Formosa teas, one needs less than this. Pour on the boiling water. Serve with cream and sugar, or lemon and sugar, or clear, as taste may indicate. Such a cup of tea will be a cure for a headache and drive the blues away.

FIEGA, THE ANCIENT

By MARY SARGENT HOPKINS

SOLOMON ENGLEMAN stood in the front of his little shop, following reverently, with a not over-clean forefinger, the lines of his book of prayer.

The Talith, which was spread over his shoulders, and without which no self-respecting Jew would think of engaging in his Sabbath devotions—was old and shabby, but Solomon was arrayed in his best clothes, his shop was in order, the heavy sewing machine and other tools of his trade, were out of commission for the day.

Overhead hung different articles of male apparel, mended, sponged and pressed, the wrinkles of wear pressed out, and the wrinkles of fashion pressed in, for an East Side Hebrew "bushelman" has his ideas of style as pronounced as those of the fashionable haberdasher and tailor of Fifth avenue.

No work or trading of any kind went on in Mr. Engleman's establishment on Saturday, the holy Sabbath Day, and if his customers did not come for their renovated garments before sundown on Friday, they must wait until after the Sabbath, no matter what the exigency might be.

The fact that Solomon was poor, and that his wife and children would be on short rations, and that he himself was not overfed, during this interim, had no bearing upon the case with this pious son of a despised race.

But, with all his religious fervor, Solomon was a coward. While he would have given up his life for the faith that was in him, he had a constitutional dread of strangers, of people who were not of his own race, and who did not worship the God of Abraham.

So on this particular Sabbath morning, an apprehensive look passed over his countenance, becoming intensified as I entered the door, and asked the number of his store, and if he were Mr. Engleman. Solomon nodded his head, not very heartily, as he saw at once that his visitor was not of his kin or kind, and removing his Talith, he stood before me, mentally trying to reconcile the advent of my visit with some idea of benefit to himself or his family.

The latter, hearing a strange voice, came pouring out from behind a curtain, which separated the work-room and "store" from the living apartment.

"Are these all your children?" I asked, as they gathered about me, while the mother modestly stood in the background, but with a sort of "on guard" expression, for how did she know but that the caller had come to complain about some one or two, or perhaps three, of her flock?

"Moses was always in some troubles" she thought, for Moses did not always follow in the footsteps of his illustrious namesake, and was not renowned for the quantity or the quality of his meekness, and could "scrap" with as much vigor as any boy of his age, be he Jew or Christian.

"AS SHE STOOD BEFORE THE OPEN BOOK"

Then, there was "Jakey."

Was Ikey Cohn making more complaints that Jakey hooked apples from the pushcart, whenever he got the chance? O yes, Ikey was smart, and he got the chance very often. And then there was Becky; had she again been pulling the hair of her sworn enemy, Rachel Goldstein? If she had, Becky was not to blame, for had not Rachel refused to give her her doll, when Becky only wanted to play with it for a little while?

All this went through Mamma Engleman's mind as she looked me over—not in the plain English in which it is recorded above, because she could neither speak nor understand the language; but her thoughts in Yiddish were sufficient to form themselves into a resolve, that no one should lay hands on any one of her flock, if she could prevent it.

"Are these all your children, Mr. Engleman?" I again asked, as the man and his wife stood side by side.

Solomon having become partly reassured by my manner, that I intended no harm to him or his, acknowledged his paternal responsibility, and said, as he glanced at his wife, "She de mudder."

"Then you are not the man I am looking for," said I. I had volunteered to do a little missionary work for a friend, and hunt up a family who were in need of help, and inquire into the merits of the case.

The announcement that he was not the man, seemed to lift a load from Solomon's mind, while his sad and anxious expression of countenance became mingled with one of relief, and the instant improvement in understanding and ability to speak English, was quite wonderful, considering the difficulties he had encountered with the language only a few minutes before.

"The woman I am looking for has the same name as yours, and, according to the address given me, she lives in this locality," I explained; "but she is sick, and has only three children. I was trying to find her and give her some help."

The sad-faced representative of the chosen race, with a nod for each child, took mental note of the number of his brood, and shook his head, for there were nine, unmistakably nine, little Englemans in the group, and it was only too evident that his wife was not upon the sick list, and any hope that the help about to be extended might come in his direction, took its flight as he surveyed the group of nine children, with their plump little mother, all in the best of condition.

"You do not know of any other poor woman about here who needs help, do you?" I asked.

"O, yes," all the little Englemans shouted in chorus—"There's Mother Fiega!"

In a rear tenement, reached through a dark, damp hall-way, lived Fiega, the ancient, and in her little room dwelt the peace and quiet of the Sabbath. Peace reigned supreme, but the perfect quiet was somewhat marred by conditions over which the devout little Jewess had no control.

Out in the little yard, where the clothes-lines crossed and recrossed, hung, what a witty writer after a visit to a similar locality, called, "the short and simple flannels of the poor." Two little black-eyed, swarthy-skinned youngsters were industriously engaged in splitting up a barrel, and incidentally filling the air with flying staves and choice Yiddish dialect.

The parents of the boys had evidently fallen from their high estate of being "Orthodox Hebrews," or they would not have countenanced such a profanation of the Sabbath. This want of reverence for the holy day was counterbalanced by the pious devotion of Fiega, as she stood before the open book laid upon the table, between the two windows facing the yard.

A brave little woman was Fiega; she had been brave for a long time, for the record in the book which her grandfather had made on the occasion of her birth, gave the date 1795.

"There is no coal, except what is on the fire," murmured the old woman, and added, "He giveth snow like wool; he scattereth the hoar-frost like ashes. Who can stand before his cold?" But there is the promise, "He sendeth out his word and melteth them." Why should I fear, I who trust in my God? I shall never freeze nor starve, and I am always clean, clean," and Fiega moved over to her narrow, but exceedingly plump bed, which took up almost half the floor space in her tiny room, and passed her hand lovingly over the lace-trimmed pillow.

"He will give meat unto them that fear him," she murmured.

Here Fiega's devout thoughts were interrupted long enough to bestow a friendly word of warning to the young Sabbath-breakers in the yard, who were now disputing over the disintegrated barrel.

Fiega would have shivered all through the day rather than have built a fire the morning of the holy day, and if the boys had not retreated rather hurriedly when they heard her note of warning, they might have found that shaking naughty little boys did not come under the head of Sabbath desecration. Fiega was brisk of foot, and the strength had not yet departed from her right hand despite the fact that she had lived in the centuries.

From her vantage ground—the door which opened into the yard—the old woman gave her opinion of Sabbath breakers in general, and of noisy boys in particular. Then, shutting the door, her face softened, and her voice fell as she murmured:

"He shall judge the poor of the people. He shall save the children of the needy. I will trust. My God will take care of me."

As she spoke the last word, the door which had stood slightly ajar since Fiega had made her verbal raid upon the boys, was pushed open, and I entered, preceded by Solomon Engleman, Solomon, having by this time acquired quite a command of English, introduced Fiega as Mrs. Schindel, a woman more than one hundred years old.

I don't know what Engleman said to her, but both hands came out toward me in greeting. She was so small that she could have walked under my outstretched arm, and as she came up close to me, I could not resist putting it about her. She could not speak one word of English, but I a syllable of her native tongue; with my interpreter's help we got on mously, holding quite a long conversation which ran something like this: "Ask her what she wants, most of all." A string of consonants, with an occasional vowel thrown in by way of good measure, was exchanged between the parties of the second part, and I am told it is "co-

CHEESE PUFFS WITH Green Salads

Corn Starch Talk

By MRS. HELEN ARMSTRONG.

In many receipts Kingsford's Oswego Corn Starch may be substituted for flour, using half the quantity, and a more delicate dish is the result. This Corn Starch may be relied upon for uniformity, and will always suit the most critical taste. A fair trial will convince the most skeptic that Kingsford's Oswego Corn Starch is a valuable and economical article of food, while the simplicity with which it may be prepared appeals alike to the unskilled cook and the experienced chef. With a little thought given to the subject quite a variety of salads may be served from day to day. Wafers are sometimes served with these salads, but a more acceptable accompaniment is suggested below. These puffs are easy to make, and are more delicate than most, owing to the substitution of Kingsford's Oswego Corn Starch for a part of the flour.

CHEESE PUFFS.

Place half a cup of water and one fourth cup of butter in a granite saucepan over the fire and when this is boiling add two rounding tablespoons of flour and one of Kingsford's Oswego Corn Starch, which have been sifted together. Cook thoroughly while cooking for several minutes, remove from the fire and stir in half a cup of fresh grated cheese. Season with salt and paprika and beat two eggs, singly. Press the mixture through pastry bag on a well greased baking sheet, making balls less than two inches across. Bake in very moderate oven about twenty-five minutes, until light and firm. These may be served warm split open when cold and filled with whipped cream to which has been added salt, pepper and a little Parmesan cheese.

would be taken care of. I took a look around the room, taking in the detail of differences between it and the squalid surroundings, saw that the little fire was waning, and beginning to give up its small ghost of life; that the tiny coal-box was empty; looked at the gathering frost upon the window-panes, and handed the little old woman a trifling sum, which she understood was for coal, and another sum for rent, for which I was told she was in arrears. Five dollars a month for that tiny room! No wonder tenement house property pays, and its owners can keep out the cold with sealskin and Russian sable, while their tenants are battling with their most relentless enemy—an arctic winter—which seems to have more terrors for them than either famine or sickness.

Here, amidst squalor and poverty lives this human century plant, exhaling the fragrance of faith in the God of her fathers, who has never failed of his promises. Here Fiega has lived for years, supported by her neighbors, many of whom are so poor themselves that even a penny counts, and when contributed to charity, means sacrifice for the giver.

"I was not always so poor," said Fiega, when she found that I was interested in her history. "I have a beautiful dress now; you may see it if you wish."

Solomon interpreted, as the little old woman opened a small trunk in a corner, disclosing some neatly folded garments. From its covering of clean white, Fiega drew forth a black velvet gown, quaint and old-fashioned. "When I was young, I was rich. I had beautiful dresses and I traveled much. I had nothing else to do, and money plenty; why should I not travel. Kossuth? Many a time I saw him. Many a time I went to grand balls at the palace in Vienna. Why not? I was young; I had fine clothes."

And the eternal feminine shone from her eyes, as she told how she was dressed upon one occasion.

"The golden girdle went three times around the waist, and hung down the sides like this," and she measured upon her clean print dress just where the ends of this beautiful ornament reached. "I saw the Emperor in his palace. No! It was not Franz Joseph; certainly not. Who was Emperor then? Yes, it was his uncle—I do forget his name, it was so long ago when I was young. But I was dressed beautifully, and I danced. I do not forget that."

"And I do not forget the famine in Gorlitz, seventy years ago, when the Christians ate sawdust and died, and the Jews ate sorrel. No, I do not forget. My grandfather's barn was burned; he was an aristocrat—a wealthy Jew. These rich people were beaten with clubs. I saw it in Austria and Hungary."

"I am poor now," continued Fiega; "but I always have enough. My God must provide. I shall never suffer," and she folded the remnants of her old-time finery with reverent fingers, and put them carefully away with the ancient book.

"The candlesticks? Yes! they are from my old home; and the lace on the pillow, that I made when I could see better. Yes, yes, always clean," she muttered, as she rearranged the white bed.

Referring again to the persecutions of the Jews, Fiega continued: "After I saw these things, the burnings of barns and the beatings, in later years I saw Jews murdered by the bawlers or woodsmen, who wanted to be free from taxes, and they beat and murdered the higher class. All now are dead—my people!"

"I have been married three times, and always in Europe. I prayed for a child, but never one came. My friend die in my arms, and her child I take to my breast; but a strange coat will not warm the body. I care for the girl; she come with me to this country; she marry. I live with her a time; then she say, 'You go live by yourself.' This last remark was accompanied by a little kicking movement on Fiega's part, which would have been comical, but for the suggested ingratitude.

"Then I live as a servant for seven months, but now—I can make my own noodles, I can keep clean, the friends are good. I am happy. I am never sick, I never had a pain, my head never ached, I need no doctor; there is my doctor," pointing upward. "He will take care of me when I am well, and cure me if I am sick. I need but little, and I shall have that; my rent must be paid; the friends gather it up. Every Sabbath I go to the Synagogue," and the delicate little body straightened itself up at the thought that God was so good to let her live so long.

Fiega would still be a handsome old lady, but for the disfiguring wig which covers her soft white hair, and which must be worn according to Jewish custom. She seemed so happy and bright, and so confident that her good Father would care for her, that as I was leaving, I asked Fiega if she would say a prayer for me. The answer came, "I will pray every day that God will let you live as long as I have lived." When told that this might not be regarded as an unmixed blessing, Fiega shut her eyes, clasped her hands and prayed: "May God give you health and strength while you do live."

The short winter afternoon was waning fast, and shadows were gathering from the corners of the tiny room.

"There is no more coal," crooned the voice of Fiega. "I had eaten the last of the bread and drank the last drop of tea; but God saw I shall neither starve nor freeze. My God has kept me alive until I am so old that no one would believe me, were it not for the record on the parchment. He will never forsake me. I shall have food and warmth and a clean home as long as I live, and that will be ten more years. Has not the Rabbi said it?"

In the little shop on the street, a pious Jew read the evening prayers for the holy day, and when his devotions were ended, Talith and Book were folded and shut. The whirr of the sewing machine began, and Solomon Engleman was once more the man of business. As the nine noisy youngsters trooped out into the street, he thought,

"If there were but three, the help might have been mine. My Sarah though, she is pretty healthy, too. I am glad that the good Mother Fiega have the money. She have the faith, but she is old. Sarah!" (this to his wife) "when Izzy Myers come for his clothes, and I am not here, charge him fifty cents extras, for the tears in his coat was very big; and the trousers of David Geldowski was worth another fifty cents extras. And if they don't like it, tell them I have business enough."

Then as he turned to his work he murmured under his breath, "The number of the street was the same, the name was the same, but there were too many children, and the wife was too healthy."

In the rear tenement, Fiega, the Ancient, sweetly slept in her plump little bed, secure in faith and trust that the morrow would be like all her yesterdays, and that all her future would be provided for, until her allotted days were done, for had not her God so promised?

Doing Good With Her Premiums

BOSTON YOUNG WOMEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

40 Berkeley St., Boston, Mass., Feb. 10.

DEAR MR. KLOPSCH: This year I have sent THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to three new readers, and in return have received the premiums as designated, also the calendars, which are very beautiful and enjoyable. I sent each premium to three other persons as Christmas gifts. The New Testament I have still, awaiting the right person upon whom to bestow so valuable a gift. You can see by this that your paper and premiums are all doing much good and are highly appreciated wherever they are sent. One copy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was sent to a newly-married couple for their wedding gift. They are also just starting out in their Christian faith, and have written me of the high esteem in which they hold the paper and anticipate its weekly visits. Another copy was sent to an invalid widow living alone, with her daughter, unable to take a paper. As a "shut-in," this Christian woman doubly appreciates THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and all its open channels to the outside world. I sent another copy into a family where there are several half-grown children, and the older ones enjoy it quite as much as the adult members of the family. By this you can see that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be busy the whole year round with its noble mission work carrying life, joy and sunlight into many hearts and homes.

Sincerely yours,

CHARLOTTE V. DRINKWATER,
General Supt.

AUNT JERUSHY MARIER'S WAY

Why she and her Friend Sary 'Lisbeth
Gave up their Trip to Town

I THO'T I'd better write and tell you about a little circumstance that came tu pass t'other day, in case it might encourage sum one else to go and du likewise. 'Twas in this manner, namely: I was a settin' and a readin' my CHRISTIAN HERALD one mornin' this week, when Sary 'Lisbeth, a neighbor of mine, cum a blusterin' in, and sez she:

"Good mornin', Aunt Jerushy. Be yu a-goin' tu town to-morrow on your holiday trip? There's goin' tu be half fare on the train fur a week, and 'twill give one a good chance tu git a little outin', and du a little shoppin' as well as to visit sum of our friends. I'm a-goin', and I s'pose yu be tu, haint yu?"

"Well," sez I, "I waz a thinkin' tu go, in fact had my mind all made up tu go, and have a little holiday time fur myself, but I guess THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has put a stop tu it."

"Why, what upon airth has THE CHRISTIAN HERALD got tu du with yu a-goin' tu town, and when yu can save half your fare, tu?"

"Well," sez I, "yu know THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is a great paper fur helpin' the poor and sufferin' ones, of which there seems tu be a large quantity on airth at the present time. I guess it must be true that, 'The poor yu have always with yu,' sure enough. Well, just now they're a-tryin' tu git enough of the Lord's silver and gold that some people's got into their hands, to feed a lot of hungry men and boys at the Bowery Mission."

"Feed um, humph," sez she, "let um go tu work an' feed theirselves."

"Yes, but they can't git work tu du," sez I, "Many of um, and sum's not able tu work, and they air a-sufferin' with cold and hunger; and yu know the Bible says, 'Whoso hath this world's goods, and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him?'"

"Well," sez she, "'twont take sich a great lot tu feed a dozen or tu men and boys; let sum of the big-bugs in New York give em a bite tu eat."

"But, Sary 'Lisbeth," sez I, "yu don't understand. 'Taint one nor two dozen men and boys to be fed, but thousands. Jest yu listen," sez I, and I picked up my paper and read the follerin': "The usual breakfast will be given tu the thousands of men and boys, for whom the doors of the Mission will open at three o'clock in the mornin'." There," sez I, "now what's our duty, not tu say privileged?"

"Why, Aunt Jerushy Marier," sez she, "yu don't mean me tu believe there's as many peeples as that in New York, that ain't got enough tu eat. Why, I didn't think there was many more than that there altogether. An' the Bowery Mission's a goin' tu open its doors before daylight tu sich a crowd as that! Why, I'd be frightend tu let 'em in. They must have a awful big house, tu; and jest think of the dishes there'll be tu wash after all them men and boys. Guess they'll want plenty dishwater. But ma'bee they had forethought enough to ketch a barrel of rainwater t'other day when it waz a pourin' so."

"Why," sez I, "as fur the house a-holdin' of 'em all, I don't expect they all go in together; and as fur washin' dishes, I guess they ain't so particular, so they git a good square meal. Now," sez I, "I've got a five-dollar gold piece that I'd made up my mind tu take an' go tu town to-morrow and spend about the whole on it; but here's all these here folks without enough tu eat. Jest think of gettin' up in the mornin' at three o'clock and goin' out in the cold for your breakfast. Must be purty hungry tu do it, I should think. But them folks, the paper sez, have no homes nor beds, but walk the streets. And as I waz a sayin', I can't take that five dollars and go gallivantin' off, a stuffin' with goodies, et cetera, till I have my dijester all out of kilter. I can't du it, I say, with a clear conscience. Why, if I should have nightmare from over-eatin', I'm sartin sure I should think that whole crowd of hungry men and boys was after me and a settin' on my stomach. Anyhow, I know they'd be on my conscience, and I couldn't injoy myself a minit, so I'm jest a goin' tu send every cent of it."

"Why, Aunt Jerushy!" sez she, a-holdin' up both hands in great amazement, "yu don't mean tu say yu air a-goin' tu send that whole five dollars, all of it, to the Bowery Mission. Why, I thought yu said they only wanted one dollar from each one, anyhow. Yu must be crazy."

"No," sez I, "I'm not. I'd be crazier not tu, and it's jest bein' in my right mind that's a-causin' me tu send it. And as fur askin' fur only one dollar, that would work all right if everybody who could, would send his or her dollar right along, but sum of em won't; so the other four dollars will jest go tu pay fur some of the people who stoppeth his ears at the cry of the poor. The paper is a-doin' a great and wonderful work for the needy and sufferin' ones, and Dr. Klopsch himself has signed his own name specially tu this request; so I'm a-goin' tu help answer his prayer fur the Bowery Mission by sendin' this five dollars, and I jest believe 'tis what the Lord wants me tu du with it. Sary 'Lisbeth," sez I, "yu better take $1.50 of the money yu're a-goin' to spend on your trip to town, and send fur the paper fur a year, and see if yu can't larn a little sumthin'."

"Well," sez she, "I don't know but I will. And the other $1.50 (I waz a-goin' to spend $3.00; 'twas what I got fur them hens I sold t'other day), I'll jest put in with yours tu send tu the Bowery Mission."

"Very well," sez I, "and yu better go right home and git it, and I'll have the letter writ time yu git back; and we'll send it right along before we change our minds, or forget it, or somethin'. And remember, Sary 'Lisbeth," sez I, "that we're a-doin' this fur the Lord, and he sees and knows all about it, and yu know he said, 'Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto me.'"

Yours truly,
AUNT JERUSHY MARIER.

Football in the Arctic

Miss Isabel Rogers Edgar, who has lately returned to New York after her second visit to Labrador, relates the following amusing incident which took place last winter:

During the long, bitter winter on the Labrador coast, the natives have so little to interest them, that they grow dull and stupid. Dr. Greenfell organized a football team. The field was marked off on the rough sea ice with potassium permanganate, and the doctor, on skates, was to act as referee. Two rules were enough—"stop playing when the whistle blows," and "don't touch the ball with your hands." At the first blow of the whistle, part of the skin of the doctor's lips and tongue were taken off; so a bone one was tried, but it froze up, after a call or two. In the end, a big dinner-bell did the whistling and the game went on, until suddenly a long, low moan, followed by a creaking, grinding sound sent players and referee back to the rocks for safety. Hardly were they on shore, before a heavy sea swept in, crushing the football field into fragments and carrying it out of the bay.

Miss Edgar, who knows Labrador and its people better than any other woman in this continent, is now giving illustrated addresses before churches, colleges, women's clubs and various other societies, dealing in a most interesting and picturesque way with her Arctic experiences, and illustrated by photographs taken by herself. She may be addressed at No. 29 East Twenty-ninth street, New York.

Macedonia May be a Battlefield

BULGARIA AND TURKEY THREATEN HOSTILITIES WHICH WOULD EFFECTUALLY STOP RELIEF WORK

THERE are ominous signs of an outbreak of war in the Balkans, early in the coming spring. For several years past, Bulgaria has been preparing for such an event, and Turkey also has been watchful of her opportunity to punish Bulgaria for what the Porte regards as an offence against neutrality. Bulgaria has openly befriended the poor Macedonians, when the latter were driven like sheep before the marauding Turkish troopers, who desolated the beautiful valleys of that province. Thousands of the fugitives have found shelter in Bulgarian border towns and villages, where they have been kindly treated. Moreover, Turkey has accused Bulgaria of fomenting insurrection in Macedonia, and of permitting the revolutionists to concoct their plans of retaliation against the Turks in safe retreats on Bulgarian soil. Both nations are now fully armed and prepared for war, and it needs but a spark to light such a flame as has not been witnessed in the Balkans in many years.

This condition of affairs is a peculiarly unfortunate one for the Macedonian refugees; not only for those in remote parts of Macedonia itself, but for all who have fled across the border. Should Bulgaria take up arms against her Moslem neighbor, the whole of Macedonia would be a battlefield. Relief work would cease immediately—as was the case in Cuba, when the breaking out of the war with Spain permanently interrupted relief work among the reconcentrados.

Up to the present time, however, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Interdenominational Relief Committee and other relief agencies are continuing their humane operations energetically. Pastor Popoff writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD endorsing letters from various members of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Committee, which show the progress of the work. From Samokov, Mr. D. M. Gulumanoff writes:

The villages Dolna Banya and Kostenetz have received nearly six hundred refugees. Every week new refugees arrive. All are from Belitza, Mehoma, Draglishta and Kremen. Three-fifths are children, the rest men and women, the latter being in the majority. Three-fourths of them are in utter poverty. All are in need of upper garments. There are children and women barefooted. Every piece of clothing that has been given was received with great thankfulness. The following distribution has been made: Fifty suits upper garments for men, fifty for women, ten for boys, fifteen for girls, five sheepskin furs for women, five for men, and forty-four pairs of a sort of slippers made of thick cloth for keeping the feet warm. These clothes are from the money sent to Dr. Clarke by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Mr. Gerassim Popoff, of Dolna Banya, writes: Fifteen families of refugees are in need of organs (bed quilts). There are needed badly for this place also, sixteen upper garments for women, eighteen trousers, ten sheepskin furs, ten pairs of navushta (wrappers for the feet), fifteen organs, nine mattresses, ten suits for children.

Pastor Popoff writes from Ichtiman, Bulgaria, Feb. 4, reporting progress in relief work at various points along the border, among the refugees. They are being sheltered by the different municipalities, the Central Relief Committees supply the food, while other benevolent agencies (including THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Committee), furnish clothing, bedding, etc. There is some sickness among the refugees, and all are hoping for spring, when they can be more comfortable, and dwell in tents in the open air. He writes:

I saw in Dubnitza, in the Monastery Khan, fifty families quartered in ten rooms. There were from twenty to thirty persons in a room, without bedding or stove and with paneless windows. They were trembling from cold, amidst the groanings of sick and half-naked children, anxiously waiting to breathe their last, and be relieved from their misery. It was ten days before some quilts (organs), could be prepared, and mattresses filled with straw. These were used for the sick until more could be provided for the others. The number of sick was constantly increasing.

Pastor Popoff lately visited three villages on the Rhodope mountains, where there were over 1,000 refugees. Many of these have been helped from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund. At Tatar Pazardjik, he also met a number of refugees. His nine hours' ride, over steep mountain paths, in a springless carriage, was an arduous one, and was followed by a spell of sickness, from which he has now recovered.

Rev. Ivan D. Stephanoff, of Kustendil, writes that the need of the refugees in that district is very great, both as to food and clothing.

At Samokov, many of the refugee children are almost naked, while others wear clothes that are little better than rags. Fortunately, the weather is not severe. Samokov, Banya and Kostenetz together, need some $1,400 for clothing alone—clothes for children, for girls, for women; sheepskin cloaks and woolen shoes. A few days ago, Rev. Leroy F. Osterlander and Mr. Gulumanoff distributed about thirty suits of boys' clothing, some woolen shoes, and several skirts for little children; also the sheepskin coats to the most needy.

Rev. Geo. D. Marsh, American missionary at Philippopolis, writes:

DEAR DR. KLEPSCHE: I was on a tour in my missionary work when your cablegram reached Philippopolis, informing me that there were funds at my disposal for relief work. The word from you seemed a providential voice that this was the duty of the hour. I at once gave orders for the manufacture of such garments, foot-gear and bedding as are most essential, and in a week, had all gathered from four cities at one point, and started with three carloads for the region of relief operations. The refugees were in twelve villages. The representative of the Central Committee, who had lately been all over the ground, accompanied me in my circuit of distribution. We decided on three villages as distributing centres. We did our work in six days, although our progress with buffalo carts was wearisomely slow.

As I am the medium of your gifts to these most needy ones, so I have the pleasure of being the medium of their thanks to the kind donors of the funds sent through me. I went into the present abode of as many as I could, to see their true condition. In many cases it is most pitiable. Many had to flee in such haste to save their lives, that they could not save much else. Many have almost no clothing up to the present time, except that which they wore when they fled from their homes. Their bedding was the merest pretense, in most cases. The bare feet, the scant attire, the wan, sad faces, the emaciated forms, tell tales of much endurance and suffering.

All contributions in aid of the Macedonian refugees will be acknowledged in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and duly forwarded to our missionary workers in the field.

We Guarantee to Fit You
Catalogue and Samples Free

Do you wish a new suit, skirt or jacket made to your measure in the latest New York style?

There is all the difference in the world between a high-class tailor-made suit, which has been made to order for you, and a ready-made garment such as you see in the stores. Ready-made suits lack individuality, and rarely have either style or fit. We do not keep them. We make to order only. Our suits are stylishly made; the jackets fit and there is the proper hang to the skirts. No detail is overlooked. You feel comfortable in them, and are proud to wear them.

We carry the latest materials, and make them up into the most fashionable garments possible. Our Catalogue illustrates 120 styles, and we have 400 fabrics from which you may select. Our new measurements insure perfect-fitting garments. All orders filled promptly.

YOUR MONEY REFUNDED IF WE FAIL TO SATISFY YOU.

Our Spring Catalogue Illustrates:

Tailored Suits	$8 to $50
Handsome Skirts	$4 to $20
Etamine Costumes	$10 to $40
Mohair and Brilliantine Suits	$8 to $40
Mohair Skirts	$4 to $15
Spring Jackets	$7 to $30

Walking Suits and Skirts, Rainy-Day Suits, Traveling Dresses, Rain Coats, etc.

We do not carry wash goods nor make silk shirt-waist suits. We pay express charges to any part of the United States.

Our Catalogue contains explicit directions for taking measurements correctly.

We guarantee to fit and please you. If we do not, return the garment promptly and we will refund your money.

Catalogue and a large assortment of samples will be sent free to any part of the United States. Ask for New Spring Catalogue No. 50. In requesting samples mention about the color you desire and we will send a full line of exactly what you wish.

SPECIAL NOTICE

All letters for the "Mail-Bag" must contain the name and address of the writer, not for publication, but so that an answer may be sent by mail if necessary.

L. E. S., Hillville, Wis. What period is represented by the words, "Time, times and the dividing of a time," in Daniel 7:25?

Students of prophecy usually interpret it as three years and a half. The word, "times," in the original indicates not many, but two. It is the division of the week, or seven years, which figures in Daniel's prophecy. The break is mentioned in Daniel 9:27, where the covenant that Antichrist makes is to be broken in the midst of the week. This, on the customary method of interpretation of a day for a year, would be the three and a half years of the passage you quote.

H. W. E., Wannakee, Wis. What is the per capita national debt of the United States, France, Germany and England?

United States, population (estimated), 80,000,000, debt, $969,457,241; France, population, 38,595,500, debt, $5,800,000,000; Germany, population, 56,367,168, debt, $2,562,000,000; Great Britain, population, 41,544,145, debt, $3,060,926,000.

J. M. The London paper is the older one, and is under different ownership and management, although similar in the features you mention.

Fairfax, Macon, Ga. Did the ancients recognize the existence of the soul, in express terms?

They did, in a variety of ways. Aristotle called it the "Entelechy," or "first form of an organized body with potential life;" the Epicureans considered it "a subtle air;" the Stoics, a heavenly light; Plato, "the instrument of rational cognition." The Greeks and Romans believed it escaped with the life or out of the death wound; the Moslems, that it took the form of a snow-white bird; Herodotus called it a stellar (or divine) essence; the Egyptians, in hieroglyphics, represented it as a basket of fire, a heron, a hawk, etc. This is altogether independent of their views on soul immortality.

Andrew D., Paterson, N. J. What is the present condition of the wage-earner in New York, and in the country generally, contrasted with that of ten years ago?

According to the statistics compiled by the New York State Department of Labor, wages in New York City have advanced ten per cent. since 1897, and in the entire country, there has been a decided rise since 1898.

J. B., Waterbury, Conn. Our newspapers frequently use the word "orgie." What is the precise definition?

It is often misapplied. It is derived from a Greek word orge, meaning violent emotion. An "orgie" is really an occasion when reason is cast to the winds, and wild, lawless, libelous conduct is indulged to the point of exhaustion. It is properly applied to a drunken revel, and not to mere excitement and confusion.

W. O. G., Powell's Valley, Pa. 1. Who was the boy that brought the five loaves and two fishes? 2. Who are the poor that we are enjoined to remember? 3. What are we to understand by Matt. 5:29, 30? 4. Also Matt. 5:48?

1. His name is given in tradition as Ben Ezra, son of Mariamne, sister of Philip, one of the twelve disciples. 2. They are those within our reach who suffer from hunger, cold or nakedness, possibly through no fault of their own. It is our duty, as followers of Christ, to share with them our abundance. 3. The right eye is the most precious of the two, so with the right hand. The lesson to us is to give up even that which is dearest and nearest and more precious, if it stand in the way of our eternal salvation. 4. It means that God himself, who is absolute perfection, is to be our Model.

M. C., Chicago, Ill. The writer was greatly stirred, recently, by the statements of a prominent member of an organization in the city of San Francisco, which has for its aim the rescue and care of unfortunate young women, irrespective of race, color, or creed. The speaker referred to has often been an eye-witness of the fearful orgies in the opium and gambling dens of Chinatown, which are frequented not only by the Chinese, but by a large number of white men and women, who have become addicted to the opium habit. These things are known to the public, but are apathetically regarded as "necessary evils."

By far the most terrible feature in connection with these gambling halls is the practice of buying and selling young Chinese girls. The Chinaman is conceded to be the worst gambler in the world; and when one of these mad gamblers has incurred a large debt, which he is unable to pay, it is the frequent practice of a father to sell his daughter into slavery, in order to liquidate his gambling debts. A girl baby of nine months sells for about $350, while a girl of twelve is worth as much as $3,000. Right in sound of the City Hall bell in San Francisco, this buying and selling of young and innocent girls—yes, even helpless babies—is going on; sold into slavery worse than death, and nothing is done by our Government to prevent it. If a negro girl were to be sold into slavery in these days, public indignation would be aroused at once; in fact such a thing would not be possible in the United States. Why, then, should these Chinese girls not be considered worth saving? We send our missionaries to China to give the benighted people there Christian liberty. This, no one will dispute, is noble work; but it seems inconsistent to allow such an evil as human slavery to exist in our free country without remedy. Is legislation to abolish this thing not possible?

If the facts are as our correspondent states, they constitute a frightful condition of affairs. Is there not in San Francisco a Society for the Suppression of Vice, or some such organization, to take cognizance of these crimes against morality, and bring them before the proper authorities?

A. A. H., Moodus, Conn. Is it right for people who lay no claim to being Christians, to sit in church and in the choir, and sing hymns like the following: "I've been washed in the blood of the Lamb?"

If you exclude them, you might be depriving them of the opportunity of becoming Christians. Better try to win them to the right way by kindness. The church's duty is to call sinners to repentance, and to win them to Christ, not to show them the door because they happen to be still unconverted.

J. M. S., Marquette, Mich. What is your opinion of the Revised Version? I have heard that an eminent minister declared it was a mischievous profanation, and that we did not need a new translation of the Bible.

We do not think that all the changes made by the Revisers are improvements, nor do we think they made all the changes that were needed; but we believe that, on the whole, their work was well done, and that they deserve our sincere thanks. We want the Bible to be as accurate as possible. If there was a single word in it that did not faithfully render the original, that word ought to have been corrected. We cannot afford to have any faults in a book so important as the Bible. It is certain that there were faults, because the men who made the translation were mistaken in the meaning of some Hebrew words, and they did not have the facilities that modern scholars have for seeing ancient authorities. They did their best, and made a much better translation than any previously existing; but their work was denounced by their contemporaries, as the Revised Version is denounced. There are sure to be people in every age who prefer a book with which they are familiar, even if it is faulty, to a new one, even though it be more accurate. The eminent minister you quote, was right in saying we did not need a new translation of the Bible. We did not have one. What we did get was a revision of the old, and it was well and carefully done.

B. F., Arkansas City, Kan. I desire to thank you most sincerely and heartily for your two excellent editorials in the two last CHRISTIAN HERALDS, respectively "The Wickedness of War" and "The Better Way." They will be productive of great good. Who that reasonably and dispassionately contemplates war with all its horrors; its inception, actual fighting and the consequences, and then contemplates peace and its blessings, could hesitate for a moment which to choose? Arbitration is second best (as you suggest), but Christians must stand on higher ground, viz., Christ's method to settle matters without arbitration. I thank my blessed Heavenly Father that I live to see the blessed peace spirit predominating over the war spirit, as it is surely doing with very marked strides now.

B. F. 1. Was there any effort made to persuade Russia and Japan to settle their differences by arbitration or otherwise, by peace societies, or individuals, or both? 2. Which nation was most desirous of avoiding war, Russia or Japan? 3. Is there a real, true Christian nation on earth?

1. None that we know of. 2. Appearances would indicate that neither wished to avoid war. They were both eager to fight for what they conceived to be their "rights." 3. We know of none that can truthfully be called an absolutely Christian nation, although there are several that have come much nearer to that description than others.

Reader, Montclair, N. J. Is there any sense in the saying that when your ears tingle, some one is talking about you?

No; it is in line with many other nonsensical sayings; but it is quite old. Pliny, the historian, says: "When one's ears do glow and tingle, some do talk of us in our absence." Shakespeare makes one of his characters say: "What fire is in mine ears?" Sir Thomas Browne ascribes the notion to a superstition that one's guardian angel touches the right ear if people speak favorably of us, and when the left is touched, then the talk is unfavorable.

HOUSEHOLD NOVELTY WORKS, (Chicago, Ill., or Buffalo, N.Y.)

A REVIVAL STIRS INDIANA

BLUFFTON, IND., has just witnessed the greatest revival ever known in that city. It has about five thousand inhabitants, and is a lovely little city, clean and prosperous. On January 24, Evangelist C. Fenwick Reed began to hold services in the M. E. Church, Rev. Dr. Beeks pastor. On February 11, just eighteen days later, he left, having stirred the whole city and community for miles around. There were some 795 seekers at the altar of prayer.

It was a marvelous series of meetings. Such manifestations of spiritual power are rarely witnessed.

Men under deep conviction ran to the altar weeping; others fell in the aisle crying for mercy, and in a few minutes arose with shouts of victory. All classes have been reached, but the great majority of converts are among those usually not touched by revivals. Doctors, lawyers, bankers, and all kinds of professional men were among the converts, with leading society people. Scores have given up dancing, and over 2,000 cards were given to the evangelist by those who professed conversion and who gave up their worldliness and sin.

REV. L. A. BEEKS

EVANGELIST C. H. REED

The evangelist had fifteen hundred cards printed with Gospel messages, and distributed among the converts. The gallery of the church had to be reserved for converts, and proved too small. Hundreds were turned away nightly. People brought their lunches to church and stayed from 2 P.M. until midnight. In the afternoon and at night, the altar was filled with earnest seekers, as many as one hundred being counted in one day. The closing meeting will never be forgotten by those who were there. All converts of the revival were asked to rise up. The audience in the gallery rose en masse and half of those on the main floor, and while the congregation sang, "When the Roll is Called," the converts waved their handkerchiefs and the church was a mass of white. Thus, with singing and rejoicing, the greatest revival known in Indiana for many years passed into history.

The entire community has been stirred and the revival fires have started elsewhere. People on the street and in stores are singing the songs of Zion. The dance has lost its charm and God is glorified.

MIGHT OF THE FEEBLE*

How Christ Makes Little Things Great by His Power

WHY did Jesus use the five loaves and the two fishes in feeding the multitude? The multiplying power that he exercised, was equivalent to a creative power. Why not then have created the necessary supply, without regard to the small provision that the boy had with him? That would not have been Christ's way of acting. He prefers to use something that we bring him, rather than to supply everything. To us, our resources may be utterly inadequate to the work to be done, but they must be placed at his disposal. He will not dispense with them. We must bring him something, and he will accept it, howsoever worthless it may seem, and will cause it to do the work that is needed.

The conversion of the world could never be accomplished by unaided human effort. Why does not God, by a supreme act, change the hearts of all men? He prefers to use human means. A man must preach and his preaching may seem weak and ineffective, but God takes the word spoken and applies it to the heart of the sinner and he is converted. The result often surprises the preacher himself. Neither he nor others can understand people being converted under a particular sermon. The explanation is that the preaching has been applied with divine power. Spurgeon used to say that the numbers of persons converted under his preaching were a mystery to him. He said, "For my own part, I would not cross the street to hear such preaching." Yet those who heard were moved and were brought to Christ. Conversion has come through a few personal words, or through a letter, or through a Sunday School teacher's simple talk, and the whole current of a life has been changed. It is the law that something must be done by human agency. The few loaves and fishes must be given and from that seed comes the amazing harvest. Therefore let no one be idle under the impression that what he can do is too little to be used.

God hath chosen the foolish things.

THE DIVINE PROVIDER

Jesus Sufficient for Every Need

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

THE Lord Jesus, during the time of his ministry, abundantly proved, to such as had eyes to see, that he was a Provider, a Shepherd of his sheep. He did not divide the sea or the Jordan, but he stilled the storm, and made the way across the lake of Gennesaret possible for his disciples, who feared to perish. He proved himself to be the Hiler in numberless instances, and raised the dead on three occasions; he provided Peter with the tribute money. He provided in his own Person the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world. It was no wonder, then, when the multitude were in need, as sheep that have no shepherd (Mark 6: 34), that, after having given them meat for their souls, he also satisfied their physical hunger.

was after the death of John the Baptist. When Jesus heard of it, "He departed thence by ship into a desert place apart" (Matt. 14: 13). The desire of our Lord for solitude was most marked all through his life: every special occurrence drove him to prayer. If this was so with him, with an absolute necessity for us to be in prayer, and to know what our Lord has to say to us, when anything out multitudes away that they may go into the villages and buy themselves victuals. But Jesus said, they need not depart; give ye them to eat." Disciples, with the Lord in their midst, should be the last to dismiss anybody without giving some help for their need. "I can do nothing with these children," says a Sunday School teacher, "they are so inattentive; they are bent on nothing but play; it is useless to try and interest them." Is Jesus then with you, dear friend? If he is there and you count on him as the provider of all you need to arouse the interest of your children, he will not fail you. "I have been preaching to this people for years," says a minister, "and I make no headway; they come and listen, but no heart seems touched; it is really no use." Did you take the Lord Jesus with you into the pulpit, and did you rely on him to give you just the words they wanted? Did you look to him to unlock the people's hearts? With him all things are possible.

"We have here but five loaves and two fishes." It is very interesting to note the little differences in the four accounts of this miracle. Matthew, who describes Christ as the King, gives the facts only, without detail or embellishment.

Fifty Yellow Roses

A VERY pleasant and happy occasion was the recent celebration of the golden wedding anniversary of Mr. and Mrs. Epenetus Smith, of Poughkeepsie, N. Y. Their home was beautifully decorated with yellow chrysanthemums, yellow ribbons, potted plants and yellow marriage bells. On the dining table stood a vase containing a bunch of yellow roses, fifty in number.

Mr. and Mrs. Smith have long been active workers in Trinity M. E. Church, of Poughkeepsie, and among the guests were many prominent members of the church and Sunday School. The teachers and officers of the latter presented Mr. and Mrs. Smith with a beautiful cut-glass fruit dish on a mirror centerpiece, set in silver. A number of friends from New York greeted the couple, and among many lovely gifts were gold coins, clocks, vases, and candlesticks, and two appropriate bouquets, containing fifty yellow roses each. The weather was delightful, much resembling, so said Mrs. Smith, the happy day, fifty years ago, when they were united at the home of the bride.

"PRAISE THE NAME"

PRAISE the name of Christ our Saviour,
For his everlasting love,
He is yet our Intercessor
In the glorious realms above.
Praise the name of Christ our Saviour,
As our Prophet, Priest, and King,
And in humble adoration
Let us his just praises sing.
Praise the name of Christ our Saviour,
As our Advocate on high,
Sitting on his throne of glory,
Still is to his people nigh.
Praise the name of Christ our Saviour,
For his all-sustaining grace,
Who in all our chequered journey
Shows his reconciling face.
Praise the name of Christ our Saviour,
For his promise clear and bright;
Who, when earthly scenes are ended,
Is our everlasting Light.

A Church Afloat on the French Canals

HOW REMOTE VILLAGES IN FRANCE ARE REACHED WITH THE NEWS OF SALVATION

WELCOMING VISITORS TO THE McALL BOAT

THE AUDITORIUM OF "LA BONNE NOUVELLE"

A SERVICE ON THE FLOATING CHURCH

WHEN the McAll Mission, which has done so much for the citizens of the French capital, sought to reach outlying districts, the problem of transportation was the first to solve. An experiment was made in 1892, with a boat which would avigate the rivers, and on which services could be held when moored near a town. A description of this boat, called the Bon Messager (Good Messenger), and picture of her, appeared in this journal at the time. Twelve years' experience with this missionary method as fully justified it, and now the system has been extended by the building and equipment of a second boat, of smaller draught, which can navigate the smaller streams and canals. A member of the McAll Mission sends us the following story of a visit paid to the boat, which is called Bonne Nouvelle (Good Tidings), while she was lying at Donnery, on the Orleans Canal:

The origin of La Bonne Nouvelle is interesting. One day a letter was received by the Board of Directors of the McAll Mission, from a woman who said she had been brought to Christ at a service on board the Bon Messager. She went on to say that she wanted to show her gratitude for the great blessing that had come into her life. She said: "I am a poor woman earning my own livelihood, but I will gladly give thousand francs [$200] out of my savings if you will send out second boat." The gift was regarded as an indication of the Divine Will; an appeal was made to friends, and now the pretty little Bonne Nouvelle is carrying the Gospel message through the country.

I had a strong desire to see for myself how the work was going, so, with a friend, I traveled one cold morning recently to Donnery. On reaching the village, we inquired of a sturdy little man with a handcart the way to the inn, and asked him if he knew anything of a boat called La Bonne Nouvelle. Oh, yes, he knew the boat well. Every one in Donnery knew it, and went to it. There was no one left in the village in the evenings. He would take us to the inn, and putting our packages in his cart he trundled off, and we were soon seated at the fire-side of the mediæval resort. After dinner we asked our hostess the way to the boat, and as the streets in the old-fashioned village are not lighted in the evening, she suggested that we go with them, as the whole family was going to the service, and they might save us from walking into the canal. We had no wish to meet that fate, so were glad to be personally conducted. The danger had been by no means exaggerated. It seems that more than one orator has had a hairbreadth escape; the wonder is that they have not all found a watery grave, or the streets end in the canal, a sharp turn leading in the narrow path along the edge.

forget all little inconveniences. The hall was already packed, and with an audience that gladdened one's very soul to see. Even the material conditions were hopeful. Agur's prayer seemed answered in every individual before us. If there were no fine dresses denoting riches, neither was there sordid poverty, such as we are accustomed to in Paris. The women wore pretty white caps, or the younger ones had kerchiefs picturesquely tied over their heads. The men, too, were comfortably attired, many of them in clean blue blouses—and such wrapt attention possess the book; but I did feel sorry for a young girl who had not one, and who ardently desired to sing. She tried to look over her next neighbor, who, however, offered her no facilities; then she craned her neck to the book in front, then back to the other. Her ideas as to those hymns must have been most disconnected. At the close of the meeting I invested in a cantique, and presented it to her. It is not often one can give such pleasure by the expenditure of eight cents. She could not believe in her good fortune. "It was not for her. I was lending it." I hoped I had convinced her; but the next evening, seeing me approaching, she evidently thought I had repented of my overwhelming generosity, and handing me the book, said, "You want it back, don't you?"

At Fay and Loges, the station before Donnery, at the close of the third meeting, 150 of these hymn books had been sold. A large number of Bibles and New Testaments are also disposed of at every stopping place; they are sold at a greatly reduced price, and are far more valued than if given away. The benefit of thus sowing God's Word is incalculable; it is a furrow of light which the boat leaves behind it. During the two days we were at Donnery, two large Bibles were bought.

One of the purchasers, a bright young girl, interested us greatly. She told us she had been converted at Fay and Loges, and that she came here every night, three kilometres [nearly two miles], because she wanted to learn more of Jesus. "I have already bought a New Testament," she said, "but I wanted the whole Bible, and now I have got it," and off she went triumphant. As the French peasant and his money are not soon parted, this constant sale of the Holy Scriptures is a very hopeful sign. The next day being Thursday, the school holiday in France, a children's meeting was held on board. There was a goodly gathering of boys and girls, many of them very intelligent, and some who sing in the church choir.

"You take a year to learn the simplest chant with me, and here you have caught up these hymns in a week," was the reproach addressed to his choristers by an incensed abbe. It is not to be wondered at; our hymns are bright and simple, and in French instead of Latin, so that they are at least comprehensible. This singing is a great offence. In spite of all that could be done, everybody that went to the boats went singing; the hymns were heard in all directions.

After the school we had the pleasure of having tea with the devoted evangelist in charge, M. Dautry and his wife, in the quaint dining-room they have improvised at the end of the hall. They gave us many interesting details of their voyage of evangelization. At one of their anchorages, seeing nothing but a few scattered houses,

THE BOAT BY WHICH THE McALL MISSION IS EVANGELIZING RURAL FRANCE

one rarely sees. Every one sat upright in his chair, so as not to lose a word; they seemed fairly drinking in all they heard. It was curious to watch the different faces—eager, anxious, interested, not one indifferent. Contrary to the custom in the ordinary mission halls, the hymn-books were sold, not lent. This, like everything human, has two sides. It is most desirable that they should

A Sermon by REV. GEORGE C. LORIMER, D.D.

Pastor of the Madison Avenue Baptist Church, New York

TEXT—I. Cor. 7 : 20 : "Let each man abide in that calling wherein he was called"

RELIGION prior to the appearance of Christ formally expressed and fulfilled itself in sacred places, in sacred seasons and in sacred observances. It had a world of its own, and it had to be entered in a peculiar mood, and to be filled with thoughts, words and deeds suitable to its character.

Alongside of it lay another domain—the secular—separated from it by customs, pursuits and ambitions. They were contrary to each other and distinct. Not that their spirit and aims did not occasionally intermingle, or their representatives, at times, live the life of the one in the other. This overflowing and intermingling was always possible. But, in theory, and generally in practice, the two worlds were looked on as standing apart, and as having their own traditions, their own obligations, and their own organs of communication. The sacred, whether in emotion, adoration, or in the surrender of sacrifices, could not dispense with the sacred, and, apart from a consecrated spot, a temple or altar, could not worthily honor itself and discharge its lofty functions. Secular things lay entirely outside the charmed circle of the religious. It was Jesus who exalted humanity above the Temple and the Sabbath; it was Jesus who challenged the exclusiveness of both Gerizim and Jerusalem, and it was Jesus who communed with the Father on the highway or on the sea, and who found in human needs, human sins and sorrows, the truest avenues for the revelation and the exercise of the divinity that dwelt within and crowned him with its halo. The whole earth was his temple, humanity his altar, and gracious words and kindly deeds to men the perfection of the praise he offered to God.

This great conception has had a hard time in trying to domesticate itself in the world. Very few in our Lord's day attained to it, and later on in Corinth, as we may infer, it was far from being comprehended.

Do not let us misjudge the apostle. His thought in this Scripture is not that when a man becomes a Christian, he is bound to accept his position in life as final. He is not teaching that the convert is never to improve, if possible, his temporal lot, or to disentangle himself from an unfortunate or servile station. The followers of Christ are at liberty "to use the world as not abusing it," and to vary their occupations as their interests may demand. Of the Spirit there is usually begotten a new ambition, a new energy, that impels people to strive for the improvement of their social condition.

Possible in all Occupations

St. Paul, in the verse succeeding the text, writes: "Wast thou called being a bond-servant? care not for it; but if thou canst become free, use it rather." The slave, therefore, was under no compulsion to accept his chains, and remain content. If he could obtain his emancipation he was not forbidden to do so; only he was not to conclude that it was impossible to live his religious life in bondage. Freedom is undoubtedly better and to be preferred. "Use it rather"; but remember in whatever state grace may find you, it is not necessary that you should abandon that state for the sake of revealing the Christian spirit or fulfilling the Christian obligations. These may be manifest and operative in any condition, and the really spiritually-minded disciple will carry them into his secular environment and limitations, believing that in these they will find their natural and God-given domain.

It is not uncommon for us still to speak of things sacred and things secular; and within reasonable limits the distinction is allowable and useful. The message of God to mankind, the Book in which it is contained, the place where it is proclaimed and where his praises are celebrated; the convictions, sentiments, fellowships, prayers and endeavors for the spiritual elevation of the race, combined with the ordinances of his house and the sweet solemnities of his service, may be classed together as "sacred." And pretty much all outside—the physical universe, the employments and pursuits of men, their earthly ambitions, their governments, industries and commercial engagements—may be grouped and designated the "secular." Understand, this classification is not final, absolute, but rather relative and convenient. And such as it is we may accept it.

From the beginning of our faith, notwithstanding the example of Christ, the relation of these two has proved one of its most serious problems. In Corinth, there was a vague feeling that in some respect they were incompatible with each other, and that to be a saint a man must renounce his unconverted wife, and in other ways extricate himself from complicity with social contaminations. Later on this impression deepened and assumed strange and superstitious shapes, and in our day is involved in considerable haze and confusion. Much, as we are aware, is written in the New Testament about the world, about its lusts, its perils and its fascinations. We are warned not to be of it, and we are commanded to antagonize and overcome it. From these exhortations, vaguely apprehended and inadequately interpreted, several fantastic and irrational inferences have been drawn, which have tended to obscure the real character of religion, and have miseducated the conscience and darkened the way of the believer. The whole subject is worth re-examination and thoughtful study. I am sure the more we ponder the seed-thought of St. Paul given in text and context, the more fully will we be convinced that he furnishes the key to the problem, and that the secular is the sphere of the sacred.

The sphere of anything is the domain for which it is fitted and designed, and in which it fulfils itself and achieves its mission. Thus, the atmosphere is the sphere of light and sound. Without it neither would be transmitted. Through this medium the one becomes visible and the other audible. The ocean is the sphere of the steamer. The vessel does not meet the ends of its being by remaining on the ways. Only on the seas, and when triumphing over them, do we see it vindicating its construction. Barracks are not the sphere of the soldier; the march, the battle, is his sphere. A bird fails entirely to meet the purpose of its creation in a cage, and a "fish out of water" is fatally out of his element. Thus the great world is the sphere in which religion is to live, move and have its being. Hence, Christ sent his disciples into its busy throngs as light to shine, as salt to preserve, as leaven to leaven, and in his great prayer he prayed, not for them to be taken out of the world, but for them to be kept from the evil.

This conception is antagonized by two special theories: the monastical, the ecclesiastical. The student of the Bible will recall several instances of holy men abiding for a season in solitude. Need I mention the names of Moses, Elijah, John, and of the great apostle to the Gentiles, who refers to his own patient sojourn in Arabia? Christ, also, at times courted retirement, and undoubtedly we are warranted in inferring that with profit their example might be followed in the modern world. Our Lord commanded that we go into the closet, and in secret commune with God. But this occasional withdrawal from the strident strife of public affairs was not to be adopted as a vocation. The retreat was not designed to be perpetual. The saintly men of the Bible who sought the desert, never made their home there—but having prepared themselves in seclusion they then addressed themselves to the activities of a real mission. What they mastered in secret they proclaimed from the housetops. Their conduct and their aims were not identical with those of the ancient hermits, or of the monks ancient or modern.

Ascetics like Anthony, Hilarion, Ephron and the rest, abandoned human society that they might escape from its pollutions and secure their own perfection. Their personal salvation was their exclusive aim. Moreover, they branded the secular as unholy, as though everything not technically sacred must necessarily be foul and unclean. They also discredited the most virtuous relations that exist, and degraded piety by proclaiming its inability to cope with the evil of the world. Instead of contending against actual foes, they wasted their strength in fighting imaginary enemies, fiends from the abyss, and phantom female tempters born of their own imagination. From the prevalence of monastic ideas religion came to have little influence on public life. The two were widely separated, and are to-day wherever monasticism and conventual sisterhoods exist.

While professing Protestants reject this kind of separation, they sometimes withdraw their religion, if not their person, from the world. In the office they are sinners, in the church they are saints. They do not use their faith as Moses did the tree. It is not cast into the bitter waters that they may be sweetened. There is often, likewise, betrayed by young converts a notion that they can serve God in an exceptionally worthier sense if they will only give up their vocations for the purpose of doing evangelistic work.

If we would see more clearly what is meant by the secular being the sphere of the sacred, let us contemplate the ecclesiastical idea. In the monastical, the devotee, notwithstanding his eloquent disavowals, lives for himself; in the ecclesiastical he lives for the church. The multitude who observe from the outside are not slow to learn the lesson, though they may learn it in a way not desired by their teachers. Why should not all their religious efforts also end at the church? Thus, punctual attendance on mass, the payment of dues, with a few other observances, satisfy a vast number of people, and having met their religious obligation in the church and for the church, they go forth into the world with a clear conscience to live as the world. From the altar to the saloon is but a step, from the mass to crooked politics is but a pace or two, and in thousands of instances when worshipers turn their back on the sanctuary they likewise turn their back on the glories which it represents. The danger is, that having quite exhausted our fervor on church rites and ceremonies, we shall have none left to expend on the great task of incarnating the religious spirit in our daily life and in the commonplace, every-day work of life.

Thus, then, the monastical and ecclesiastical ideal run counter to what I believe is the aim of New Testament religion—to make for the sacred its true sphere the secular.

And what more reasonable? If the light permeates the hard dark texture of the diamond; if it plays on the surface of the green and stagnant waters; if it seeks entrance through the smallest rift and crevice into the foul and gloomy chamber, brightening all, cheering; why should not religion, charged with infinitely more love and pity, do as much for the happiness and peace of the race?

I admit that it counts for little if we have embraced the ancient heresy of the East, that matter is essentially evil and the source of sin. If the physical necessarily pollutes and defiles, then we never can believe that God made or fashioned it, neither can we imagine that it touches it or dwells therein. He pronounced the work of his hands "very good," and I for one am not convinced by the speculative babblers, old or new, to pronounce it bad. Neither can I subscribe to the pernicious notion that the body should be outlawed and proscribed as a curse and degradation. Much that we hear in our times of mortal mind, of the uselessness and sinfulness of material remedial agencies in sickness, and of healings when there is nothing to heal, grounded in the morbid illusion that the body, which Christ describes as the Temple of the Holy Ghost, is irremediably base and corrupt.

Why Reform Often Fails

When false premises such as these form the point of departure, it is no wonder if thinking becomes more and more confused. The taint from the material world is easily imparted to amusements of the most innocent kind, to the domain of politics and to art, athletics, and to almost anything that enters into secular life, and the visionary ascetic feels called on to leave everything that does not come within his category of the sacred to rot and perish in its own corruption. Instead of pointing out the evils that may attach to any or all of these things secular, and instead of purging them away by the grace and power of the religious spirit, he washes his hands of them in toto. Thus what would be notable reforms constantly fail for lack of reformers, and if the world is no better, it is largely due to the failure of professed Christians to realize that their religion is really able to transform society into its own image.

These reflections will, perhaps, assume a more convincing significance if we make plain the ends to be served by the ensphering of the sacred in the secular.

First. It is designed to restrain and check the secular. We must remember that the church is related to the great world as Holland is to the sea. As dykes are necessary to shield the latter, so the utmost vigilance is needed to protect the former. The ocean is always everywhere encroaching. Scientific men point out that it has been gaining on the eastern seaboard of America, and it is well known that the English coast line has been invaded. Resistance to these inroads are imperative, and further, when waters subside we should try to gain on the sea. We ought not to be indifferent. Some secular is continually intrenching on the sacred, seeking to undermine its authority and impair its value. This was the peril perceived of ancient times. Christians were warned to have no fellowship with the world, and to regard it—that is, its lusts, pleasures and idle ambitions—as an enemy. This warning was not unnecessary, though, to a great extent, it has been in vain.

The Church Secularized

In our day, we, too, may err; the secular may invade the sanctuary and obscure the character of the sacred. The church may be ruled by fashion, the pews may be desecrated by the parade of wealth, and its temporal affairs be conducted in a sharp, haggling, sordid way. We are necessarily much with the world. We are set into its whirlpool, and it is not easy for us to feel what we have learned there. I have known congregations where there was as much scheming as ever characterized politics, and as many despicable methods employed as ever were adopted by tricky traders—numbers evading their obligations, scaling down the subscriptions, driving hard and fast bargains with their employees, and showing no more pity or compassion than the most soulless of corporations.

Secondly. The sacred should interfuse the secular, and the secular may be sanctified. Every fresh day furnishes new evidence that worldly affairs need the touch the divine purifying spirit. It is not for the church, such, to found business houses, establish daily papers and conduct theatres. The assumption that she ought to do so, is simply the revival of theocratic assumptions in modern form. But whether in business or politics, Christian men should carry the sacred principles of the faith. Many of us are humiliated as we contemplate the condition of society. We move along a well-processed, well-fed procession of worshippers, to the sanctuary; but, as we move, we pass the hungry, the neglected, the beggared—and do not seem to realize that these wretched ones are our reproach.

Life Dignified by Faith

We can never Christianize commerce, statecraft, or society, by remaining apart and doubting whether Christianity has any mission to the secular. There must be first a settled conviction that she has, and then determination to embody the faith, not by fervent protestations against wrong, but by the application of genius and spirit to home, workshop, office and national and international affairs.

Thirdly. We should do this, that through the sacred may dignify the secular. Perhaps an extreme illustration will make clearer my thought. I have been told that steamboats could be coaled at Naples and Yokohama with great facility by hand, hundreds of men and women carrying the loads on their heads. It is said that this wearisome procession continues tough day and night until the job is finished. Can you imagine work less inspiring than this? With that dullness of soul, with what hopelessness must such tasks be undertaken! What is there on the morrow to cheer? What is there to thrill or lift up the heart of the laborer? But imagine that these people were Americans or Englishmen, and that word had been set of a threatened invasion, and that the fleet must be sailed at every cost in order to be prepared to meet the foe. With what alacrity the most refined and cultured would undertake the task. They would strain every nerve for the glory of the flag and for the safety of the land, thinking that in ages to come, when telling the story of another armada, their children's children could proudly say that their grandfather and grand-uncle carried coal on that memorable day. It is the motive, the end to be served, that dignifies the toil.

Take another illustration in a more luxurious sphere. I knew an old gentleman who had accumulated a vast fortune and surrounded himself with the splendor of wealth, who spent his closing years in fretfulness and melancholy. He had no object in life. He had no special interests here and none hereafter. His sole delight consisted in trying to outwit and disappoint his heirs, and in insulting them whenever he had opportunity. He presented a picture of wretched and degraded affluence of the most pitiable kind. On the other side, think of John Pounds, a cobbler, gathering neglected children round him and striving to benefit them, and then it is made apparent that a cobbler's bench can become as grand as the bench of bishops—unless the bishops are using their episcopal functions for human betterment.

There is a story told of the famous Dr. Arnold that will bear repeating. He was sent for to comfort and pray with a dying man; after he had discharged that solemn duty he returned to the school, where the sixth form boys were waiting for him to hear their Greek recitation. It is reported that he felt for a moment the transition to be very sharp and radical—from a death-bed to the sixth form. He reflected, however, that in both he was honoring God, and that he was rendering in the one as much as in the other dignified service. Yes; if the humblest teacher in an elementary public school only uses her opportunity religiously she has transfigured her calling.

Patriotism in Politics

So with all other vocations. When we are conducting our business so as to increase the prosperity of others, to diminish the area of want and suffering, or when, in addition, we expect that our earnings shall be devoted to the humanizing and Christianizing of the world, the whole aspect of our pursuit is changed. We are not simply seeking gain. Our ambition is to use our talents for the glory of God and the progress of mankind. How different and how much grander politics are when we engage in them for the sake of our country, and not for our gain, that the rights of the poorest may be secured and that international justice and amity may be promoted. So of banking, laboring, manufacturing, and everything we undertake. It is the predominance of the sacred in the secular, that exalts and makes even a servant's work divine.

Believe me, it is now more than ever imperative that Christian people should act on the principles of this discussion. Society is asking the ugly question, "Why are not the social ills more quickly healed? What is the church for if not to rescue the world from its own passions and tragical follies?" Writers without end are enumerating in a bitter spirit the failures of religion, and some of them declare that the times, with all their refinement and luxury, are debasing beyond hope multitudes of our fellows.

The Spirit of Jesus in Life

The church will save both herself and society if she is only diligent to exalt the Christ. If he reigns, evil cannot; if he is crowned by humanity, all enemies are conquered. Do you ask how is this, how does this glorious sequence follow? The result is inevitable. Let the Spirit of Jesus prevail in the community and all will be well. That Spirit is an innate and holy love of humanity, and wherever it exists an apostolate of goodness and healing is felt. Before its sacred breath war perishes, the scaffold crumbles, animosity dies, selfishness expires, royalty disappears, and dogmas cease to be dead formulas and expand into living principles and benefactions. This spirit solves the social problem. With Victor Hugo, it says: "Look you; there is a people and there is a world; and yet the people have no inheritance; and the world is a desert. Give them to each other, and you make them happy at once. Astonish the universe by heroic deeds that are better than wars."

This is the earthly mission of Christianity. How is it to be accomplished? Why, by Christianity becoming Christian. Let the followers of Jesus have confidence in their own faith, let them believe what they profess, and practice what they believe, and they will very speedily rescue society from its foes. Are you blinded? Do you think you perceive a shorter method? Will you assassinate your Cæsar in the Capital? Will you rely on violence, repression, and even revolution? Cæsar indeed fell, and civil war ending in an Emperor was all the fruit—bitter fruit. The form of society was changed, not the heart of humanity. Are you disposed to experiment along the same lines? If you are, knowing, as you must, the inevitable failure, can you believe that you really love humanity or the Christ who died for its redemption?

I do entreat all Christians to put away the expectation that by socialism or by quack remedies of any kind, wrong, tyranny, moral pollution and industrial inequalities can be overcome. Christ Jesus is still the hope of the world. Let him be revealed in the daily ministry of his myriad followers and his saving spirit will soon come to rule where it ought to reign supreme, in the marts of trade, in the temples of pleasure, in the councils of state, and in the intercourse of nations—and all the earth shall then be beautiful with the radiance of justice, peace and human brotherhood.

A Simultaneous Evangelistic Movement in Pittsburgh

PITTSBURG is now the scene of one of the most profound and thorough evangelistic movements in modern times. A new epoch has been evolved which will mark a new epoch in revivals. It is believed by good authorities, that the "Pittsburg Plan" will be followed by hundreds of cities all over the world, in the attempt to reach the masses.

"Greater" Pittsburg has a population of over one million people, and the evangelical churches have been considering for a long time, how they might reach this multitude with the Gospel. The time seemed ripe for a extensive union effort. Two object lessons in evangelism stirred the hearts of the ministers. One was the great success of the Presbyterians in their tent work last summer, when 128,000 people attended their meetings, and as a result, 3,714 people accepted Christ as a personal Saviour. The other fact was the remarkable revival under Dr. Torrey, in Melbourne. At the quarterly meeting of the Ministerial Union of Pittsburg and Allegheny, last October, after the reading of a paper on the wonderful revival in Melbourne, a motion was unanimously passed that a committee be appointed to wait upon each Ministerial Association, with a view to securing the appointment of representatives of each denomination, to organize a Simultaneous Evangelistic Movement. This was carried out, and the representatives organized themselves into a General Committee, representing seventeen denominations.

There has been wonderful Christian fellowship among the different denominations, and a remarkable spirit of love and unity. The sectarian spirit has been forgotten, and all have united to reach the unchurched masses. Over 500 churches have stood shoulder to shoulder in this magnificent campaign. At first, only three central meetings were planned, but as the work grew, other sections of Allegheny County called for central meetings, until there are now twenty central meetings, holding on an average two services every day, except Saturdays. As a preparation, many circles of prayer were organized, and a great number of cottage prayer-meetings were held. More than one thousand neighborhood prayer-meetings were reported to the General Committee.

The Central meetings began on Feb. 14. On Monday, Feb. 22, the Pittsburg Daily Times printed a table, stating that 40,000 people had attended the evangelistic meetings on Sunday, Feb. 21, and 3,200 signified their decision to begin a Christian life. Many of the halls, theatres and largest church edifices have been crowded every afternoon and night to their utmost capacity. Hundreds have stood in the aisles, and hundreds, in many cases, have been turned away. Rev. Joseph P. Calhoun, D.D., a Presbyterian pastor in Allegheny, was elected Chairman of the General Committee.

There have been hundreds of laymen who have given their time as ushers, personal workers and on the various committees. The financial side has been kept in the background in the meetings. The reason of the few collections, is that the Finance Committee have secured about one hundred men to stand behind the movement and to guarantee to make up any deficit in the expenses. The expenses will be about $15,000, or at the most $20,000. Much excellent religious literature has been distributed. One order for 20,000 hymn-books was insufficient. Each evangelist brought his own singer; great chorus choirs have been organized, and the singing has been a feature in this campaign. Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman was selected as the leading evangelist, and he has from the beginning consulted with the General Committee, and has given the benefit of his experience and great ability as an organizer. Other evangelists have been Rev. W. E. Biederwolf, Dr. R. A. Walton, Rev. F. E. Smiley, Rev. L. W. Munhall, D.D., Rev. John F. Robertson, D.D., of Scotland; Rev. E. F. Hallenbeck, D.D., Rev. Frederick Schiverea, Rev. Thomas Needham, Rev. Austin L. Prewett, Rev. David Winters, D.D., Rev. James B. Ely, Rev. J. C. Chapman, D.D., Rev. W. S. Miller, Rev. E. L. Eaton, Rev. Henry Ostrom, Rev. James M. Gray, D.D., Dr. S. F. Walker, and others. No city in this country ever before had so many able evangelists conducting meetings at one time.

There are many advantages in a Simultaneous Mission. It captures the public opinion of a whole city for a given period. The meetings absorb the attention of the greater part of the population. It requires such a movement to touch the population of a great city like Pittsburgh. This wonderful city, with all its wealth and all its intense business energy, has been compelled to stop in its commercialism and consider spiritual matters. The pulpits and the press and the pew have demanded attention of the business men, the clerks, the laboring classes, society women, rich and poor, old and young.

Besides the Central meetings in Allegheny, in the Carnegie Music Hall, under Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman, the down-town central meetings in the Fourth Avenue Baptist Church, under Rev. W. E. Biederwolf, and the noon meetings under Dr. Chapman and Dr. James M. Gray, in the Second Presbyterian Church, central meetings have been held in the following districts in Pittsburgh and Allegheny, and the surrounding towns and cities: South Side, Shadyside, East Liberty, Lawrenceville, Oakland, Sharpsburg, Millvale, Lower Allegheny, Carnegie, McKeesport, Wilmerding, Knoxville, West End, Homewood, Coraopolis, Grafton, etc. In the down-town districts on Sunday afternoons, the large Alvin Theatre has been packed with men, and hundreds have been won for Christ. Several thousand persons have expressed their decision to take Christ as a personal Saviour. There have been, besides the general meetings, many special meetings for men, for women, for young people, for boys and for girls and smaller children. A careful count has been made of the attendance, and it is stated on good authority that an aggregate of over 300,000 people have attended the meetings so far.

Strategy in the Russo-Japanese War

RUSSIA CONCENTRATING AND REINFORCING--JAPAN WIDELY EXTENDING HER LINES

FORTS AND LAND DEFENCES OF PORT ARTHUR, WHICH RUSSIA HAS MINED FOR DESTRUCTION, SHOULD JAPAN CAPTURE THE CITY

1. "Golden Hill" Fort. 2, 3, 4, 5. Forts and Fortified Hills. 6. Main Fort. 7. Dockyard. 8. Battery. 9. Merchants' Offices and Stores. 10. Waste Land. 11. Chinese Quarter.

DISPACHES from the Far East, though fragmentary and contradictory, seem to indicate that the crisis of the Russo-Japanese conflict is rapidly approaching. It is not improbable that before this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD reaches its readers, the hostile armies in Corea may have met in a great battle north of Pyeng-Yang, and near the Yalu River. For weeks past, Russia has been steadily strengthening her forces along the Yalu, and she is now believed to have an army in that region upwards of 60,000 strong, including 20,000 Cossacks. Her patrols have penetrated far into Corea and have come in contact with the Japanese outposts at several places, driving them in and taking prisoners. The most important of these outpost affairs occurred near Pyeng-Yang, where a Cossack patrol, under Lieutenant Lonchakoff, pursued several Japanese cavalymen, but retired on finding the walls manned by Japanese sharpshooters. The Russians reported that a Japanese force, estimated at 6,000 strong, was occupying and fortifying the Corean town, which is 100 miles south of the Yalu.

Simultaneously with the news that General Kouropatkin, the Russian Commander-in-Chief, lately appointed by the Czar, had started from St. Petersburg for the Far East, to assume personal control of the campaign, came the intelligence from Tokio, that the entire Japanese General Staff had set sail for Chemulpho, all plans for the land campaign having been completed, and the work of transporting the troops being satisfactorily finished. As the outposts of both armies were in sight of each other, a general movement was expected shortly. Japan has preserved the greatest secrecy concerning all her military movements, and no correspondent is to be allowed to join the General Staff at the front until a battle has already taken place. Confirmation has been received of the news of a Japanese force having landed south of Vladivostok. It is said that 25,000 infantry, with light artillery, debarked at Song-chin, and marched through mountain passes to a point near the Northern Corean frontier; but very little is really known of the movement. Shortly after the arrival of this invading force, news was received that a section of the Trans-Siberian Railway, a mile and a-half in length, had been destroyed between Harbin and Nikolisko. Another dispatch represented the Japanese who landed at Song-chin, as marching in the direction of Hunchun, in Manchuria.

Similar secrecy marks the Japanese operations in Central Corea and on the Liao-Tung Gulf. It is reported that 60,000 Japanese have been landed at Gensan, on the eastern coast of Corea, opposite Pyeng Yang, the design being to utilize this force in a flanking movement when active operations begin. Another force of unknown strength has been sent to Yinkow, the port of New-Chwang, the object being to seize the gulf section of the Manchurian railway and open a general campaign in Southern Manchuria.

All sorts of conjectures are indulged as to the outcome of Japan's bold and aggressive campaign, and it is significant that, in St. Petersburg, there is no little uneasiness, and a lively suspicion of Japanese traps for the Czar's troops in Corea. Kouropatkin has not yet reached the front, and meanwhile any day may bring forth stirring events in Corea. It is understood that the army on the Yalu has been instructed to follow defensive tactics, until the arrival of the Commander-in-Chief. It is quite probable, however, that the Japanese campaign will develop long before Kouropatkin reaches the Yalu.

On March 3, the main force of the Mikado's army began its march from Seoul northward, along the "Pekin road," with the intention, it is believed, of forcing the fighting in the mountainous country, where the Cossack troopers cannot act to the same advantage as on the open plain. On both sides of the Yalu River, forts and earthworks have been constructed by the Russians. Gen. Inouye, who had an important command in the Chino-Japanese War, is in chief command at Seoul, and has proclaimed martial law. He goes to the front with the army. His advance guard is at Pyeng-Yang, 150 miles from the capital. Forty miles further north is Anju, where there is a force of 5,000 Russians. Seventy-five miles north from Anju is the river. To this goal the Japanese are now pushing forward, through the hilly country. Beyond the river and continuing on the line of the broad and well-worn "Pekin road," is

New-Chwang will be defended, should the Japanese attempt to land there, and the women and children are now leaving; but it is believed that the first great shield by Russia, for the protection of the Manchurian railway, will be made in the neighborhood of Liao-Yang, which is midway between Yin-Kow and Moukden. Gen. Kouropatkin's headquarters will be at Moukden, west of which lies the great plain through which the railway runs. To this point the Czar's army is prepared to fall back, but it will resolutely contest every foot of ground further westward. To retire further might involve the complete surrender of the railway, and ultimately of Manchuria.

There is a strong likelihood that, with the first general retrograde movement, Russia may have to cope with a new, and by no means insignificant enemy—the new Chinese rough-riding troops of Manchuria. At the first sign of a serious Russian reverse, these half-savage freebooters, who are numbered by the thousands, and well mounted and armed, will doubtless be ready to seize the opportunity to begin a guerrilla warfare. They are said to be bold, strong, and quite equal to the Cossacks as irregular cavalry. Another danger lies in the possibility of the Chinese regular troops—there are some 30,000 strong, in two detachments, under Generals Mand Ching, on the Manchurian border—taking the field, even against the imperial order from Pekin.

At Port Arthur, General Staff-off has replaced General Stoess as commander of the fort. It is current rumor that the defences of Port Arthur have all been mined, and, rather than permit them to fall into Japanese hands, the splendid and costly fortifications will be destroyed by the Russians. Vladivostok and New-Chwang are also said to be mined, so that the pressure of an electric key would hurl their defences skyward. It is assumed, however, by the Russian officials, that there will be at least several weeks' delay in Japan's campaign, on account of the weather, and for other reasons; and this will be an enormous advantage to Russia and may materially change the aspect of affairs.

RUSSIAN TROOPS MARCHING ACROSS THE MANCHURIAN PLAIN

Liao-Yang, some 150 miles north of the Yalu, where the main force of the Russian army is concentrated. Moukden lies fifty miles still further north. If this movement should succeed, and should the Russians be driven beyond the Yalu, the Japanese forces from four different quarters would then effect a junction, and having Vladivostok, Port Arthur and the peninsula effectually isolated, would be free to prosecute the campaign vigorously on Manchurian soil.

Russia is resolved to retrieve her reverses and will throw an immense army into Manchuria as rapidly as possible. Before the end of March, it is expected that she will have a force of at least 325,000 men available to check the Japanese advance. An imperial order has been issued in St. Petersburg, summoning to duty the reserve subalterns, naval reserves and first-class reserve men of European Russia. This means practically the mobilization of the entire army for service in the war.

The Corean Minister at St. Petersburg has been recalled. American marines have been sent to protect the American mines at Unsan, Northern Corea.

It is now believed that the Japanese lost a cruiser, and possibly a torpedo boat, in the action at Chemulpho, in which the Russians lost the Variag and Korietz.

Jack London, the Journal's war correspondent, writes from Pyeng-Yang concerning the military occupation of Corea by the Japanese: "No one of the civilian population is afraid of them. The women are safe, the money is safe, the goods are safe. They are paying for whatever they take. I have yet to see one drunken Japanese soldier."

As a measure of precaution against a possible rising against Russian rule in Finland, orders have been issued from St. Petersburg for the immediate strengthening of the fortress of Sveaborg and other Russian military posts in that country. A movement has also been made against political suspects in Poland, and 300 arrests are reported at Lodz. Two Russian universities have been closed in consequence of demonstrations by the students against their war with Japan.

WAR NOTES

Refugees from Port Arthur report the Russian troops as short of food. In February 15 there were 30,000 soldiers in the fortress.

REAL CHURCH FEDERATION IN JAMAICA

By REV. G. E. HENDERSON

REV. F. B. MEYER AND PASTORAL CO-WORKERS

IN this country and in England, mutual fellowship and co-operation are happily developing and diminishing, if not demolishing, the boundary fences, which each religious denomination has hitherto made it a primitive duty to construct and to keep in constant repair. In the mission fields, however, the movement is even more advanced, and from many of these we are learning by practical experience the possibility and the mutual advantage of closer contact and communion between the churches. In the land of Jamaica, for which public sympathy has been so recently awakened, the denominations are coming together in a way that may serve as an example to the churches of other lands. Seven years ago, the desire for closer Christian fellowship took practical shape, in the formation of a Council representing nine different denominations, whose chief business is to promote Christian union, seeking to develop and to realize a more vital Christian experience in the churches of the island.

The Bishop of the Episcopalian Church, the Rev. C. M. Douet, entered heartily into the movement, and ministers of the Presbyterian, Baptist, Moravian, Wesleyan, Congregational, Disciple, and Christian Alliance churches, have, year by year, been working together, with increasing evidences of success, toward the desired end. Each year a conference is held at Mandeville, a convenient centre of the island, and a week is spent in public services and in seeking to understand more fully the practical experiences of Christian living. All the churches of the island are, at the disposal of the Council; but the meetings are chiefly held in the Episcopal Church, which is the largest and most convenient building that could be selected for the purpose.

In this movement, which is now a power in the Christian life of Jamaica, two brothers, members of a prominent family on the island, John and William Clark—the one a planter, and the other a judge—have taken a conspicuous part. Both were members of the Episcopal Church, though ignorant of the spiritual side of the life they professed. By a strange coincidence, each was converted about the same time, by reading Newman Hall's tract "Come to Jesus." Their new-found experience led them to demand baptism again, as the voluntary sign of their surrender to Christ, and dedication to his service.

Each became active in evangelistic work, and frequently the brothers would go out together to conduct meetings. Thus they became known to the different churches of the island, and obtained a peculiar influence, which has been exerted in drawing together the Christians of the island.

The accompanying illustration shows the Mandeville Council with the officers seated in the front, and in their midst the Rev. F. B. Meyer, and H. B. Macartney, who visited Jamaica last year, at the invitation of the Council, to hold special services in the island. This is the council which disburses any funds sent in in response to appeals for aid for the recent cyclone sufferers, that have appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Some money has already been received and forwarded to the Rev. D. A. McKellop, treasurer of the Council, yet the amount received is but little compared to the present need that arises from the terrible cyclone of four months ago. All the crops upon which the people depended for their support were destroyed, as well as the homes of 50,000 of the inhabitants. The distress that followed will be severely felt for many a day. There are few persons on the island who are now able to relieve the necessities of the many.

An American lady now visiting at the Baptist Mission Home in Brownstown, Jamaica, writes under date, Dec. 5, as follows:

"The day is done; a busy day indeed for Mrs. H—, who constantly lends herself to all the tiniest matters that are brought to the parsonage door, by the humblest seeker for advice, comfort, or pecuniary aid, often now so sorely needed. But, alas, minister's purses in this part of the world, are replenished only as the poverty of the people will allow, and to give, give, give, like a stream going out to refresh a parched and thirsty land, is an impossibility.

"But for the power of sustaining grace, and a living faith in a loving, heavenly Father, her heart would faint and fail; but she goes bravely on, cheering all. If you could only present a word picture, sufficiently near the truth, as I see it, so that they could realize the facts, then surely our Father's stewards would hasten to supply means adequate to the needs of the people."

Yet the Mission House at Brownstown is but a sample of many that lie within the area that has been swept by the storm.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will forward any funds intended for the relief of these sufferers, or money may be sent direct to the credit of Rev. D. A. McKellop, Treasurer of the Mandeville Conference, the Bank of Nova Scotia, Sear's Building, Boston, Mass., and they will forward it to him free of charge in Jamaica.

THE BEAUTIFUL VICTORIA REGIA IN CASTLETON GARDENS, JAMAICA

THE CUP

IT was a beautiful piece of wood, smooth and white, and when the man picked it up he turned it over and over, admiring its smooth, firm surface.

"I will carve a cup from this wood," said he, "and it shall be so beautiful that I will drink from no other."

So the man drew and carved beautiful designs, for in his right hand lay the cunning that fashioned lovely thoughts, that soon took shape on the outside of the cup.

And when he had finished, he was well pleased with his handiwork and with the smooth cleanliness of the inside.

Now from henceforth," said the man "I will drink from this cup only," and he straightway dipped the cup in the fountain of youthful love. The water was clear and sparkling, most beautifully pure, but ere long the draught grew bitter, as he dipped the cup again and again, for the man was very thirsty.

If this is love, I'll none of it," said he, and he turned his back upon the fountain, sweet and pure.

Farther along the way he sat him down to rest, and once more dipped his cup in a pool most pellucid, and clear; its waters did not rush and sparkle like liquid sunlight as did the fountain of early love, but O so cool and inviting, as the Monday sun beat hot upon the highway. He heard a voice which said, "This is the water of conjugal love, drink, and satisfy thy longing soul"; and as he drank, the water grew bitter, until in his soul the man cried out, "There is no good thing for me, why am I not like other men. From my youth I have kept God's commands, and why is there no sweetness for me?" And putting the cup away from his lips, he wandered on with downcast eye and troubled thoughts. A little further down the road, a tiny brook sang its way to the broad river beyond. The brook was fed by springs, which were so clear and cool that its waters were like crystal. "I will now tarry until my thirst is quenched, for the springs of paternal love must be pure and satisfying," said the man; but lo! even as he dipped the cup and held it to his parched lips the draught grew acrid, and he dashed the water to the earth.

"Ah! out where the river rolls, mayhap, this unhappy heart will find what it has vainly sought so many long years," and the man pressed on toward the river of fame and earthly honors.

He reached its brink, only to find its waters like those of the Dead Sea, and he drank no more, and his soul grew small within him.

The sweet young girl, his early love, came in his dreams and offered his thirsty soul relief. The wife of his bosom would fain ease his pain; his children, not understanding, were grieved but could not help, while the world cared not, neither were honor and fame anything to the man.

At last he faced the great ocean of eternity. Its waves were lapping his feet, as he gazed with eyes that saw not, far over the waves; he stretched out his hands, and in a voice grown strangely pathetic, he said, "O God of the ocean, into the deep I commend my body. I cannot retrace my way; the fountain of youthful love, the pool of conjugal joy, the springs of paternal affection, and the river of honor and fame, have only given me a bitter draught, and now before the ocean of eternity I stand with nothing but my beautiful cup, which I carved with such care, and drank from so faithfully all my life." And the man laid the cup carefully on the sands out of the reach of the incoming tide, which, when the time was come, took him as gently upon its waves as a mother gathers her child to her bosom, and he thirsted no more forever.

And the cup, the beautiful cup, was buried in the sand by the passing winds.

It was carved of quassia wood, from the Tree of Bitterness.

Some Strange Things I Have Seen

A graduate of America's greatest University, near the top of his class, that did not have sense enough to give his seat in a street car to a woman with a baby in her arms.

A preacher, whose discourse on "Unselfishness," "melted the multitude" in the pews, and who at the dinner table, forty minutes after, got raving mad because the waiter did not leave everybody else and serve him.

Men who rob the poor with their right hand and deal out charity to them with their left. The first was a sixty per cent. deal, the second forty; a clean net gain of twenty cents on every dollar.

Oyster soup served at a church supper, so thin that you had to buy four plates to get six oysters. Price, 30 cents a plate.

Revival meetings—so called—where the people were made worse rather than better, by the man and the methods used.

A church that had "a seating capacity of eighteen hundred," when they wanted a noted visiting preacher to use their edifice for his sermon, and a fortnight later, when its use was desired by a hard-pressed Bible cause, it had shrunk to less than the holding of "the church over the way," that had exactly eleven hundred and ten sittings.

Three estimates of attendance at a meeting. The political estimate was 2,000; the religious estimate was 1,400; the pious fact was 962.

Men whose eyes, like a horse, are made to see double. Twenty converts at an evening's revival meeting, will be reported as forty in next day's morning paper.

Many—very many—sinners who live like saints; and saints—very many—who live and lie like sinners.

A heterodox head on a pair of fine, broad, orthodox shoulders.

A man who arose and said he had "nothing to say," and took forty-five minutes to say it.

For several weeks past, during the cold and stormy weather, the Bowery Mission has fed every morning before daylight, not less than one thousand hungry and homeless men and lads, the majority of whom have walked the streets, unsheltered, all night. The crowds of famished still continue to come to the door of the Mission between 2 and 5 o'clock, A.M., and are grateful for a steaming cup of coffee and a generous roll—the only meal, as we suspect, they have eaten in many hours. A very considerable proportion of these wanderers come from other States. They have drifted to New York, and are making a brave struggle for existence. The Bowery Mission is helping them. We invite all our readers to send a contribution to the Bowery Mission Breakfast Fund, care of this paper. All such contributions will be acknowledged in our columns.

A National Disgrace

WHETHER or not the investigation now in progress before the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections results in the conviction of Reed Smoot of polygamy, and in his expulsion from the United States Senate, it has already been productive of great good in publicly exposing the iniquitous Mormon system of Utah.

Joseph P. Smith, the Mormon President, who has been testifying before the Senate Committee, has proved the very best witness the opponents of Mormonism could have wished. In the course of his testimony, he admitted that he has, at the present time, five wives, who have borne him eleven children since the passage of the Anti-Polygamy Act in 1890. He admitted that practically all the leading officials of the Mormon Church are to-day living in polygamy; that "Apostles" Teasdale, M. F. Cowlett and John Henry Smith, have each two wives; that "Apostles" Taylor, Merrill and Grant, are reputed polygamists; that "Apostle" Lyman was a Mormon; that the Mormon hierarchy was supreme in the direction of political affairs in Utah, and that "Apostle" Reed Smoot, before becoming a candidate for Senator, asked and received the Church's consent.

The Mormon President's personal views on polygamy were given with a freedom of expression that amounted to a virtual confession. He admitted that he was a violator of the law in continuing his own polygamous relations, but added: "I took my chances of violating the law. The people of Utah are broad-minded, and I was there, always ready to pay the penalty of the law." At the same time, although he and the other leaders of the Church were flagrant violators of the law prohibiting plural marriage, he asserted that the "rule" of the Church was against it; that he knew of no plural marriages having taken place since 1890—or rather, he "had seen none."

It would not be profitable reading, were THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to print the details of this man's testimony, although it was given in public session, before a Congressional Committee.

"Plural marriage is a cardinal principle of our faith. I think plural marriage is the correct thing." "A celestial marriage is a marriage for time and eternity." "We believe men and women may be married after death." "God has shown to me that Mormonism is a divine institution." "All the Mormon Church Presidents down to myself have had plural wives." These are a few of the comparatively milder statements of this witness who, according to one of the counsel in the case, "believed plural marriage to be a divine order temporarily suspended, and who, along with the other leading Mormon church officials, was now living in actual polygamy," the whole constituting a present propaganda of this vile doctrine, while pretending to obey the law for its suppression.

There are many parts of the Mormon President's testimony that would make one blush with shame at the avowal that such immoral conditions should exist in our own land.

But several of President Smith's admissions are of the highest importance, as showing the true attitude of the Mormon Church toward the Federal Constitution, and these have a direct bearing upon the case of Senator Smoot. President Smith's admissions that the Church dictated the politics of its adherents, and that its claims upon them took precedence of all others; that, notwithstanding the Anti-Polygamy Act, plural marriage is still upheld privately by the Church as an essential doctrine, and polygamy practised by its leaders, and that "Divine revelations" through the Church may cause Mormons to disregard their oaths; all lead to the inevitable conclusion that a Mormon Congressman, whether Senator or Representative, will represent not his State, but his Church in the national legislature, and will act and vote as his Church directs.

Herein, it seems to us, is the very heart and essence of the case against Senator Smoot. If he represents the Mormon Church in Congress as its oath-bound apostle, instead of being the representative of the people of Utah, he has not the slightest color of a claim to a seat in the Senate. Wholly apart from the question whether he is a polygamist or not, this is the point for the Senate to decide.

Union in Christian Work

REPORTS published in the New York newspapers, of a speech delivered recently by a Philadelphia clergyman, present a pessimistic view of the situation of the churches. They are being submerged, he contended, and that, too, by organizations they have called into being. As an illustration, he quoted the Young Men's Christian Association, as doing a work that the churches ought to do. Hospitals, too, were losing their denominational character; and even a Baptist college was no more Baptist than its President could help, and a Presbyterian college was hardly Presbyterian any longer.

If these facts were true, which is not quite certain, they do not afford ground for a gloomy view of the condition of the churches. The chief object is to have the work done; and if it is being done by an agency organized by the churches and not by the churches themselves, there is no reason for distress. The Young Men's Christian Association, for example, can do its work more efficiently, providing better accommodations and larger facilities than could any single denomination, which might undertake the same work. Better one central institution, efficient and well equipped, supported by all the churches, than a number of weak denominational organizations. The tendency of the times is toward combination, and that because it avoids competition and tends to concentration of effort. There can be no doubt that the interests of young men would be promoted better by an institution established for that one purpose than by a church which made it only one of many enterprises. It is true, perhaps, that denominationalism does suffer, in losing the credit of doing some particular work; but the church does not suffer, inasmuch as it is Christian work and is being done by Christian people.

Lamentation over the disappearance of denominational hospitals and colleges seems similarly unnecessary. If patients are cured in the hospital, it does not matter whether the physician or the surgeon was baptized by immersion or sprinkling. The essential question is whether he is skilful and attentive to his duties. The Baptist denomination has a right to be proud of supporting such an institution, and has reason to rejoice if the Methodists and Presbyterians, instead of establishing a rival hospital, join in making theirs more efficient and more useful. With the colleges, too, though in less degree, the same principle applies. The college that gives the most thorough education, that gives us the most learned and consecrated preachers, is more to be desired than the one that has emphasized its denominational peculiarity to the exclusion of sound scholarship. A young minister who graduates from a Presbyterian college is more likely to build up a church and win souls for Christ if he has been thoroughly grounded in Biblical knowledge, and taught how to make logical and effective sermons, than if most of his college training had been devoted to making him a valiant champion of Calvinism.

The enemies of the church in our day are astute and very much in earnest. Nothing could better serve their purpose than to have the church broken up into rival bands, each proclaiming its own peculiar tenets, and treating all other denominations as enemies, or at least as competitors. That the denominations should recognize each other as comrades, not abandoning their distinctive features, but co-operating in any good work, intent only on having it well done, is a consummation to be heartily and devoutly welcomed.

The "Game of War" in the Far East

IT is a great game which is now being played with all its dramatic accompaniments, in the Orient. Thus far, the Japanese have displayed superior skill at almost every point, while Russia seems to have played at haphazard, trusting to her great strength and traditions of racial superiority. The Mikado's General Staff, before leaving Tokio, as the cable states, planned out the campaign complete to the last detail, providing for every contingency. As in a game of chess, the leader directs his opponent, so the Japanese, by bold initiative, have forced Russia into the very position they desired her to take. They so disposed their pieces that, at the proper moment, they might unite, seemingly drawing a net about the enemy.

Yet these plans, perfected with infinite care, may amount to nothing in the end. Russia, by skilful strategy or superior strength, may be able, on the Manchurian plain, to retrieve earlier losses and roll back the advancing Japanese.

The world makes its boast of the advance of civilization; but the boast is ill-timed when hosts of men, armed with the deadliest weapons that can be devised, confront one another on sea and land, intent on battle, and with murder in their hearts. Lust of terror and power still holds its throne in the breasts of potentates and statesmen, and produces its awful results in bath and desolated homes. Not for such a condition did Christ come to teach men that God was their father and they were brethren. After nineteen centuries the lesson has not been learned, and we fear will not be learned until He comes, whose right it is to reign, who will judge among the nations, and at whose word they shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning hooks, and not learn war any more.

Norway Returns Thanks

WHEN the people of Aalesund, Norway, after the recent destructive conflagration, which almost wiped out the entire city, appealed for help from abroad, the proprietor of this journal cabled, through Hon. W. W. Thomas, Jr., the American Minister at Stockholm, a contribution of ten thousand crowns (about $2,700), to be applied to the relief of the destitute. This was transferred by Minister Thomas to Dr. S. Ibsen, the Norwegian Secretary of State (and son of the celebrated author, Henrik Ibsen), with an expression of the heartfelt sympathy of Christian America to the sufferers. Secretary Ibsen, in acknowledging the timely and welcome gift, wrote to Minister Thomas, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE ROYAL NORWEGIAN
CABINET, MINISTRY OF STATE, STOCKHOLM.

Mr. Minister:—I have had the honor to receive the letter, dated to-day, in which you, Mr. Minister, in view of a telegram from Dr. Louis Klopsch, publisher of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, of New York, have the goodness to express to the Government and people of Norway, the sympathy which America is extended to us on account of the fire in Aalesund, at the same time assuring that the sum of ten thousand crowns will, as a contribution from the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, be received by the victims of the catastrophe.

Permit me, Mr. Minister, on behalf of my countrymen and myself, to express a deep-felt gratitude for the sympathy which has been manifested in the United States, and for the magnanimous gift, which still further increases the debt of gratitude in which we remain to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, whose magnificent charity towards sufferers in Norway, of which proof was given on an earlier occasion, is still in our hearts and grateful remembrance.

I accept, Mr. Minister, the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

An Eccentric Railroad

ONE of the most extraordinary curves on a railroad, is that, a picture of which appears on this page. It is a double curve, almost circular, and the spectacle of the train as it goes over it, is one of the strangest to be witnessed on any line on earth. It is on the road between Calcutta and Darjeeling, near the top of the Himalayas. The famous traveler, W. S. Cope, gives a vivid description of his journey over the road. It is 246 miles from Calcutta to Darjeeling, but as the train has to crawl 7,400 ft. up the mountain, it makes innumerable zigzags, the length of the journey is greatly increased, and the time it consumes is twenty-four hours. At the start, the traveler is glad to clothe himself in the thinnest clothes in his wardrobe, but after a few hours he wants his overcoat, and before he arrives at his destination, he has on him all the furs and furs he can find. For five hours he is on the narrow gauge, then there is a change to a three foot gauge, and finally to a two foot gauge, over which the locomotive makes its toilsome ascent at the rate of six miles an hour. "The line winds in and out along the mountain side, often by the edge of tremendous gorges and precipices. At one spot the track follows the lines of the figure 8. At another it rises in a series of zigzags, the locomotive sometimes in front and sometimes pushing at the rear." When it reaches the famous loop, it describes a complete circle, only that the train end passes over the river, by a bridge, thus gaining a higher level. It is a most eccentric and fascinating journey, and the construction of one track is one of the most brilliant triumphs of engineering skill. Of course the numerous loops and detours lengthen the journey, and the traveler often realizes that he is going backward instead of forward; but it is upward all the time and is an easier way than a straight course. To a reflecting tourist might we compare it to his voyage through life, in which, though he has to deplore some backward steps, he may be thankful if the trend is surely upward, and if, like the traveler to Darjeeling, he can be sure that in the end he will reach the summit, where pure air and life giving breezes are to be found.

Who shall ascend into the hill of the Lord? Or who shall stand in his holy place? He that hath clean hands and a pure heart (Ps. 24:3).

Clap of a Building

Fourteen lives were lost in New York, on March 2, by the collapse of a building in process of construction. The iron skeleton of a new apartment house had been erected as high as the tenth story, when, with an awful, grinding crash, the huge girders and girders fell in, crushing the workmen engaged in the erection. One of the girders, in falling, struck the rear of a hotel adjoining, and killed a guest who was sitting there at lunch. Cries and groans were heard from the wreck for some time after the collapse of the structure, and some of the men were taken out and sent to hospitals. Many others, however, lay under the huge girders, and could not be reached. One man was found alive twenty-four hours after the collapse, but he was so badly crushed that he died on the way to the hospital. The cause of the disaster is under investigation, but the general belief is that it was due to faulty construction. More than once the Building Department of the city had interfered, and had notified the contractors that the rules of the Department were being violated, and that the work must not proceed until the law had been complied with. Only on the morning of the collapse, legal proceedings were commenced to compel the builders to obey the law. On the other hand, the contractors believe that the collapse was due to a bed of quicksand lying, unknown to them, below the foundations of the building. An investigation will of course be made to determine the responsibility for the disaster. That must be done to prevent a recurrence of such calamities, but it can do nothing to help the families who have been bereaved. The sad fact for them, is, that whether the fault was in the construction or in the foundation, the collapse came and robbed them of their loved ones. The lesson for us is the moral one, that in character there is but

and the title and privileges acknowledged. If the discovery had been made earlier, the head of the house of Courtenay in each generation would have exercised the privileges and worn the title of Earl of Devon. How many there are who might have the title of sons of God, but do not avail themselves of the offer made to them!

As many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God (John 1:12).

Won Back Her Inheritance

A romantic story lies behind a will presented last week in the New York court for probate. It was the will of a wealthy diamond-dealer, who died recently. He had three daughters, two of whom were married. Though he was nearly eighty years of age, he had given an intimation of his intention to marry again, his first wife being dead. His daughters were opposed to it, and one of them was so out-that shows the determination as well as the precocity of the principals. A clergyman at Mount Freedom, N. J., was out making a call on a sick member of his church, when he noticed a boy and girl whom he did not know, making their way through the village. The thermometer registered zero, and a fierce northwest hurricane drove the frozen snow in their faces, but the young couple plodded on, apparently oblivious of the blizzard. Half an hour later he reached his home and there found the young couple waiting for him. They had come in half frozen, but had been enjoying the warmth of his kitchen, and were looking tired but cheerful. They told him they wanted him to marry them. He asked their ages, and learned that the girl was only fourteen, and the boy sixteen. They had walked in the storm a distance of eight miles over the mountains, from the solitary farm where the girl lived, to have the ceremony performed. The clergyman said, he should not like to marry any couple so young as they, and urged them to wait three or four years. They begged and implored, but he would not consent to officiate, and they went away sorrowful. They made inquiries in the village, and learned that two miles farther on there was another minister. They immediately set out for his house, and this time succeeded in their object. They were overjoyed, and started on their ten-mile journey home, heedless of the storm and the darkness. Perhaps they will live to regret their success. Marriages made at so early an age often do prove to have been unwise. But the determination of the young people, their persistence in spite of obstacles, and their disregard of toil and hardship, are a lesson in other matters. If those who are seeking union with Christ were as much in earnest as these young people were for union with one another, none would fail or be discouraged, and none would ever be separated from him.

This one thing I do, forgetting the things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things that are before, I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus (Phil. 3:13).

BRIEF NOTES

There is a prospect of Episcopalians having a fine Cathedral in Boston, Mass., through the bequest of the late Miss Mary Sofia Walker.

The numerous friends in this country of Gipsy Smith, will be interested in learning that he is setting out for an extensive evangelistic tour in South Africa.

Two gifts of $100 each have been sent to Rev. George H. Lea, of Jamaica, toward the fund for the rebuilding of churches in that island which were wrecked by the hurricane last year. They came, respectively, from the Old South Church, Boston, and the Tompkins avenue Church, Brooklyn.

Rev. H. B. Swafford writes us that there is a good field in Northern California, for consecrated Christian workers. Vast stretches of country in the rural districts are utterly destitute of the means of grace. Volunteers would work under the auspices of the Sacramento Valley Church Federation. Any person willing to undertake such work, should communicate with Rev. H. B. Swafford, Arbutle, California.

The New York Bible Teachers Training School, of which Dr. Wilbert W. White is President, at its annual meeting elected the following new trustees: Dr. J. Ross Stevenson, Pastor of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church; Dr. R. S. MacArthur, Pastor of Calvary Baptist Church; Dr. Charles E. Jefferson, Pastor of Broadway Tabernacle; D. W. McWilliams and John D. Slayback, New York; Dr. Reese F. Alsop, Rector St. Ann's Episcopal Church, Brooklyn, and Hon. Henry B. F. Macfarland, Washington, D. C. The school has just closed its year, having had one hundred and ninety-five students enrolled, coming from fifteen different States, Canada, South America, South Africa and Japan.

For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid which is Jesus Christ. Now if any man build upon this foundation . . . he shall receive a reward (1 Cor. 3:11, 12, 14)

Unconscious Rank

The death of an English nobleman recently, has brought to light a remarkable circumstance in the history of the family of which he was the head. It is, that for the space of three centuries there was in every generation an earl who was unaware of his dignity, and of his right to a seat in the British House of Lords. The successive heads of the family accepted knighthood, baronetcies, and other honors, not knowing of their being legally entitled to an earldom. It appears that Queen Mary conferred the Earldom of Devon on Edward Courtenay in 1553. As he was childless when he died, it was supposed that the title had become extinct. It is usually so when the first holder of a title has no sons, though in the case of later holders, their heirs inherit it, if they can trace their pedigree to the original holder. A lawyer, who casually looked at the royal patent granted by Queen Mary, noticed that the usual words, de corpore, limiting the succession to sons, had been omitted, and the title descended with the estates to the heirs. A suit was at once instituted, spoken that she incurred her father's wrath. He sent for his will and destroyed it, and made a new one, disinheriting her, "on account of her unbecoming and unloving conduct." Soon after making this will, and before he could carry out his matrimonial project, he was seized with sudden and severe illness. He was away from home at the time and among strangers. Hearing of her father's plight, the disinherited daughter went to him, and for several weeks nursed him and waited on him with filial devotion. It was, however, impossible to save his life. When he learned that he must die, he sent again for his lawyer and instructed him to draw up a codicil, restoring to his daughter the inheritance of which the will was to deprive her, explaining that he did so "as a mark of my returned love to her for her late devotion." The old man will doubtless be charged with being capricious and inconsistent in changing his mind, but he had sufficient cause. The ancient prophet labored to convince his people that God was justified in acting so toward his ungrateful children.

When I say unto the wicked, Thou shalt surely die; if he turn from his sin and do that which is lawful and right, he shall surely live, he shall not die (Ezek. 33:14, 15).

Determined to Wed

A New Jersey journal tells the story of a wedding which was celebrated last week,

INTRODUCTORY

[The story of Joseph and Asenath, which appears here for the first time in English, is founded upon the words of Genesis 41:45, "and he gave to him to wife Asenath, the daughter of Poti-pherah, priest of On." It seems that this religious romance was once widely known in the East, since different versions of the same are extant in Syriac, Armenian, Arabic, Ethiopic, Greek and Latin. Part of the Greek version was published by Fabricius in 1721; but the complete story was first issued by the French scholar Batiffol, in his Studia Patristica (Paris, 1889, 1890), according to four manuscripts, and from this text the English translation is now made. The author of the story was no doubt a Christian, who made use of Jewish traditional matter.]

Asenath the Beautiful

IN the first year of plenty, in the second month, on the fifth day of the month, Pharaoh sent Joseph forth to go through the whole land of Egypt. In the fourth month of the first year, on the eighteenth day of the month, Joseph came to the borders of Heliopolis, and he gathered together the corn of that land as the sand of the sea.

There was a certain man in that city named Pentephres, a priest of Heliopolis and a satrap of Pharaoh, and a ruler of all satraps and great chiefs of Pharaoh. This man was very rich and exceedingly wise and mild, being also a counsellor of Pharaoh, because he was wiser than all the great chiefs of Pharaoh.

He had a daughter named Asenath, eighteen years of age, tall and very beautiful. She was not like the daughters of the Egyptians, but in all respects was like the daughters of the Hebrews, being tall like Sarah, and comely like Rebecca, and beautiful as Rachel; and the fame of her beauty spread over all that land and unto the ends of the earth, so that on this account, not only the sons of the great chiefs and satraps, but also the sons of the kings, all the young and mighty men, wished to marry her. And on her account there was much strife among them.

The first born son of Pharaoh heard of her, and he entreated his father to give her to him for a wife, and said to him: "Give me, Oh father, Asenath, the daughter of Pentephres, the first man of Heliopolis, for a wife." And his father, Pharaoh, said to him: "Why seekest thou a wife who is inferior to thee, who art king of this whole land? Behold the daughter of Joakim, King of Moab, is nearer to thee, for she is a queen as well as very beautiful; take her, therefore, for a wife."

Now Asenath was high-minded and proud, and no man had ever seen her, because her father had nearby his house a great and very high tower, and, above the tower, there was an upper story having ten rooms. The first room was large and beautiful and strewn with bright stones; and its walls were covered with flat pieces of costly and variegated stones. The ceiling was of gold, and inside were many silver and golden gods of the Egyptians, fastened to the walls. And Asenath worshiped and revered them, and offered sacrifices to them daily.

The second room contained all the dresses and chests of Asenath. There was much gold and silver in it, and new apparel interwoven with gold, and many select gems and precious linen and all her ornaments.

And the third room was the treasury of Asenath, containing all the good things of the earth. The other seven rooms were occupied by the seven ministering maidens of Asenath, each one having one room, because they were of the same age and born in the same night with Asenath, and she loved them much. They were also very beautiful.

The great room of Asenath had three windows. One, which was very large, looked into the court toward the east; the second toward the south, and the third toward the street. And a golden bed stood in the room, looking toward the east; and it was covered with purple, interwoven with gold, prepared of hyacinth and linen. Round about the house was a large court, and round about the court a very high wall, built with square stones. In the court were also four gates overlaid with iron, and a guard of armed men watched them. Inside of the court, toward the wall, trees of great variety and all bearing fruit, were planted, their fruit being mellow, for it was the time of the harvest. To the right of the court was a spring of water, and underneath the spring a basin or fountain receiving the water from that spring; from thence it went like a river through the midst of the court, and watered all the trees.

Now, in the first of the seven years of plenty, in the fourth month, on the eighteenth day of the month, Joseph came into the borders of Heliopolis, to gather the corn of that country. And as he came near to that city, he sent before him twelve men to Pentephres, the priest of Heliopolis, saying, "I will lodge with thee to-day, because it is noon and time for dinner, and the heat of the sun is very great; and I will refresh myself under the cover of thy house." When Pentephres heard this, he greatly rejoiced, and said, "Blessed be the Lord God of Joseph, because my lord Joseph has thought me worthy."

And Pentephres called the steward of his house, and said to him, "Make haste and prepare my house, and make ready a great meal, for Joseph comes to us this day."

When Asenath heard that her father and mother had come from the field of their inheritance, she rejoiced greatly and said, "I will go and see my father and mother."

And Asenath ran into her room, where her dresses were, and put on a dress interwoven with gold, and girded herself with her golden girdle and put bracelets on her hands, and golden sandals on her feet; and round about her neck she put a costly ornament and expensive gems, having the names of the gods of the Egyptians inscribed on all sides, on the bracelets as well as on the stones; she put also a mitre upon her head, and a diadem she bound tightly around her temples, and covered her head with a veil.

And, hastening, she descended the steps from her upper room, and came to her father and mother and kissed them. And Pentephres and his wife rejoiced very much over their daughter Asenath, because they beheld her dressed and adorned like a bride; and they took all the good things which they had brought from the field of their inheritance, and gave them to their daughter. And Asenath rejoiced over all the good things, over the grapes and pomegranates and dates, and over the doves and fruits and figs, because everything was beautiful and good to the taste.

And Pentephres said to Asenath, his daughter: "My child," and she answered: "Here I am, lord." And he said to her: "Sit down between us, and I will speak to thee my words."

Having seated herself between her father and mother, Pentephres, her father, took in his right hand her right hand, and kissed her, and said: "Most beloved child." She said to him: "Here, I am, my lord father." And Pentephres said: "Behold, Joseph the mighty one, comes to us to-day; and he is the chief of all the land of Egypt, and King Pharaoh has made him the chief of a land, and he supplies all this land with corn, and it from the coming famine. The same Joseph is fearing man, and wise and unmarried, as thou art, and a man mighty in wisdom and understanding. The spirit of God is upon him, and the grace of God is in him. Now then, most beloved child, I will give thee to him for a wife, and thou shalt be his bride, and shall be thy bridegroom forever."

When Asenath heard these words of her father, she trembled, and said: "Why dost thou, my lord, speak these words? Wilt thou give me for a slave, a stranger, and a fugitive, and a purchased person? Is he not the shepherd's son from Canaan? Is he not the one whom his master put him into the dark prison? Pharaoh took him out of the prison, when he interpreted his dreams, in the same manner as also the old men of the Egyptians interpret. Nay, but I will become the wife of the king's first-born son, because he is the chief of all the land."

When Pentephres heard this, he ceased from saying any more to Asenath, his daughter, about Joseph, because she had replied boldly and with anger.

II.

The Coming of Joseph

And a youth of Pentephres' household leaped in, and saith to him: "Behold, Joseph stands before the gates of our court."

When Asenath heard these words, she fled from before her father and mother, and went up to the upper story, and to her room, and stood by the large window looking toward the east, that she might watch Joseph. Pentephres and his wife, and a family, and household went out to meet Joseph, and as the gates of the court were opened, which looked toward the east, Joseph entered, sitting in the chariot of Pharaoh. Four horses, white as snow, and with golden-studded bridles, were harnessed, and the whole chariot was made of pure gold. Joseph was dressed in a white robe and his stole was of purple, made of linen interwoven with gold; a golden wreath was upon his head, and round about the wreath were twelve choice stones, and upon the twelve stones were golden rays, and in his right hand he held a royal rod, which had a divided olive branch and much fruit on it.

After Joseph had entered into the court, the gates were shut, every stranger remained outside of the court, and the gate-keepers closed and locked the doors. Then Pentephres and his wife, and all their family, with the exception of their daughter Asenath, came and fell before Joseph to the ground. And Joseph, having descended from his chariot, lifted them up.

And when Asenath saw Joseph she was struck to the heart, remembering her words. And she was much afraid, and she said in her heart: "Woe is me! Whither shall I go now, or where shall I hide myself before his face? Or how shall Joseph see me, because I have spoken evil concerning him? Woe is me, whither shall I go and hide myself, because he sees every hidden thing, and knows all things, and no hidden thing is forgotten by him, on account of the great light which is in him? And now he is gracious unto me, O God of Joseph, because I have spoken evil words in ignorance concerning him. I was foolish and bold, because I mocked at him and spoke evil things about him."

And Joseph came into the house of Pentephres and sat upon the throne, and they washed his feet, and set before him a separate table. And looking up, Joseph saw Asenath, and he said to Pentephres: "Who is that woman who stands in the upper story by the window? Let her go away from this house."

And Pentephres said unto him: "My lord, she is thy daughter; thou seest standing in the upper story is not a stranger, but is our daughter; but if thou wilt, lord, she will come and salute thee, for our daughter is as thy sister."

And Joseph was glad because Pentephres told him this. And Joseph said to Pentephres and to his wife: "If she is your daughter, let her come, for she is my sister."

Then her mother went and brought Asenath to Joseph, and Pentephres said to her: "Welcome thy brother." And Asenath said unto Joseph: "Hail, O lord, blessed of the most high God."

And Joseph said to her: "The God who vivified me, may he bless thee."

And Pentephres said to his daughter Asenath: "Go and kiss thy brother."

As Asenath was approaching to kiss Joseph, Joseph ended his right hand, and he said: "It is not proper for a god-fearing man, who blesseth with his mouth the Lord God, to kiss a woman who blesses with her mouth dumb and dumb idols, and eats from their table the bread of strangling; but the man who fears God kisses his mother, and his own sister, and the sister of his tribe, and his wife, all such as bless with their mouth the Lord God."

When Asenath heard these words of Joseph, she became very sad, and her eyes were filled with tears. And when Joseph saw her weeping he pitied her very much, because he was meek and merciful, and feared the Lord. He then laid his right hand on her head, and said: "O, Lord God of my father Israel, thou most high and powerful God, who makest alive all things, and callest from darkness to light, and from error to truth, and from death to life, bless thou also this maid, and quicken her with thy Holy Spirit, that she may eat the bread of life and drink the cup of thy blessing, and remember her with thy people whom thou hast chosen from the world was, that she may enter into thy rest which thou hast prepared for thy elect, and live in thy eternal life unto eternity."

And Asenath was very glad over this blessing of Joseph. She hastened to her upper room. She was in much fear, and she remembered these words of Joseph at how he spoke to her in the name of the most high God. She then cried bitterly, and withdrew from her gods which she worshiped, and the idols which she had adored, and she waited till evening.

Joseph ate and drank, and told his servants to bind their horses to their chariots and to go round all the country. And Pentephres said to Joseph: "Let my lord remain here to-day, and go on your way to-morrow."

But Joseph said: "Nay; I will go to-day, for this is the day on which God began to create his creatures, and on the eighth day I will return to you and stay here."

When Joseph had gone away, Pentephres and his family went about their business, and Asenath was left alone with her maidens, being sad and weeping. She ate neither bread, nor drank any water; and while all were asleep, she alone was awake and wept. After this Asenath arose and went silently down the steps from the upper story, and went to the gate, where she found the gate-keeper sleeping with her children. And she hastened and took down from the door the covering of the curtain, and she filled it with ashes and brought it to the upper story and placed it upon the pavement. She then locked the door and put the bar from the side, sighing and weeping heavily.

When the maiden whom Asenath loved more than the others, heard her sighing, she hastened and went to the door, awaking also from sleep the other maidens, and she found it locked. And she heard the sighing and weeping of Asenath, and said to her, standing outside: "What aileth thee, my mistress? What maketh thee so sad, and what giveth thee such trouble? Open unto me."

And Asenath answered from within, without opening: "My head suffers a great and heavy pain. Go, therefore, every one of you to her room and rest, and let me alone."

III.

Asenath's Renunciation

And when each maiden had gone to her own room, Asenath arose and opened the door of her chamber silently, and went to her second room, where her garments were, and she opened her coffer and took out a dark tunic, which she wore when her brother, the first-born, had died. Having taken this tunic, she took it to her room, and carefully locked the door again and threw the bar from the side. Asenath then took off her royal robe and put on the mourning dress, and loosened her golden girdle and girded herself with rope, and put away the dress of her head, together with the diadem, and the bracelets of her hands and her feet. She then took her chosen dress and the golden girdle and the head-dress and diadem, and flung them out of the opening looking towards the north, to the north. She also took all her gods which were in the room, gods both of silver and gold, of which she had a number, and broke them into pieces, and flung them out of the window to the beggars and the needy. She also took the royal meal, the fatlings as well as the fishes and the meats of the heifer and all the offerings to her gods, and the vessels of the wine of offering, and flung them out of the window looking towards the north, to the dogs for food.

Then she took the curtain with ashes and spread it on the ground; she took a sack and girded her loins; she loosened the plaits of her hair and besprinkled her head with ashes. She also strewed ashes on the floor, and fell upon the ashes, and with her hand she wrote her breast, and cried the whole night bitterly till morning.

When she arose in the morning she looked, and behold the ashes on her were like clay, because of her weeping; and she fell again on her face upon the ashes, till the sun went down. Thus she did seven days, without eating food.

On the eighth day, as the morning dawned, and the birds already sang, and the dogs barked at the passers-by, Asenath rose a little from the floor on which she was lying, because she was weak and exhausted from much humiliation; for she was distressed and faint-hearted, and her strength failed, and further she turned against the wall sitting down below the window looking towards the east; she threw her head into her lap, twisting the fingers of her hand over her right knee, her mouth was closed, and she opened it not. In her heart she said, "What shall I do, or whither shall I go? to what place shall I flee, or to whom shall I speak? For all will hate me, and with them also my father and my mother, because I have renounced their gods and destroyed them and given them to the needy. For my father and my mother will say: Asenath is not our daughter; and my people will hate me, and all men, because I have given their gods to destruction. And I, too, have hated every man and all that sought me in marriage, and now in this my humiliation I am hated by all and they rejoice in my affliction. The Lord of Joseph hates all who worship idols, because he is a jealous God, and, as I have heard, fearful to all who worship strange gods. And he hates me also, because I worshiped dead and mute idols, and blessed them. But now, I have fled from their offering, and my mouth is estranged from their table, and I have not the courage to call upon the God of heaven, the Most High and powerful of the mighty Joseph, because my mouth is stained with the sacrifices of idols. But I have heard forever doing thy will, since thou, O Lord, spakest and all became, and thy word, O Lord, is life to all thy creatures; to thee, O Lord God, I now flee; from now will I cry unto thee, O Lord, and to thee will I confess my sins; to thee I direct my prayer, O Lord, and to thee will I reveal my transgressions. Spare me, O Lord, because against thee I have sinned much. I acted lawlessly, I acted wickedly, I spoke unutterable and wicked things before thee; my mouth, O Lord, is defiled from the offerings of the Egyptian idols, and from the table of their gods; I sinned, O Lord, before thee I sinned, knowingly and unknowingly. I acted wickedly in adoring the dead and mute idols, and I am not worthy to open my mouth to thee, O Lord, I, the wretched Asenath, daughter of Pentephres, the priest, the virgin and queen, once pompous and proud and prospering in my ancestral riches above all women, now solitary and deserted of all. To thee, I flee, O Lord, and to thee I bring my petition, and to thee I cry. Deliver me, O Lord, from my persecutors, before I am left by them; for as a helpless child, which fears some one, flees to his father [and mother] and the father, stretching out his hands, presses it to his breast, thus thou also, my Lord, stretch out thy hand to me like a father loving his offspring, and snatch me away from the hand of the enemy having understanding. For, behold, the old and fierce and wild lion persecutes me, because he is the father (of the gods) of the Egyptians, and his children are the gods of those who are worshippers of idols, and I hated them and destroyed them because they are children of the lion, and have thrown away from me all the gods of the Egyptians and destroyed them.

"Behold, O Lord, my humiliation, and have mercy upon me and pity my distress. For behold, all the gods which I formerly worshiped ignorantly, I know now to be mute and dead idols, and I have utterly destroyed the twelve, to be trampled under foot by all men, and the thieves have plundered those which were of silver and gold. Pardon me, O Lord, for I have sinned much against thee in ignorance and have spoken blasphemous words against my lord Joseph, and I did not know it."

Thus and much more did Asenath pray to the Lord, and when she had ceased making a confession, behold the morning star of the heaven arose in the East. And when Asenath saw it, she rejoiced and said: "Has not the Lord God heard my prayer, because that this star is the angel and herald of the light of the great day?" And behold, near the morning star, the heaven was parted asunder, and a great and immense light appeared. And when Asenath saw it, she fell on her face on the ashes. And a voice spoke to her and said: "Asenath, arise!" She said: "Who calls me, since the door of my room is locked, and the tower is high, and how came he into my room?" And the voice called her again a second time, saying: "Asenath! Asenath!"

And she was much afraid and fell upon her face, not being able yet to stand on her feet. And the voice said to her: "Take courage, Asenath, and be not afraid, but arise and stand on thy feet. Go now without hindrance into thy second room, and take off the black dress which thou hast on; throw the sack from thy loins, shake off the ashes from thy head, and bathe thy face and hands in clean water, and put on a white new dress, and gird thy loins with thy shining double girdle, and come again, and I will tell thee the word sent to thee."

Asenath hastened and did as she was bid, and the voice said: "Take away the veil from thy head. Take courage, Asenath, for behold, the Lord has heard all the words of thy confession and thy prayer; he has also seen thy humiliation and distress during the seven days of fasting. Behold, thy name is written in the book of life, and shall not be blotted out forever. From this day thou art renewed and quickened, and thou shalt eat the blessed bread of life and drink the cup filled with incorruption. Take courage, Asenath; behold, the Lord has given thee to-day as a spouse to Joseph, and he shall be thy bridegroom, and thy name shall no more be called Asenath, but thy name shall be City of Refuge, for unto thee shall many nations flee, and rest under thy wings, and many nations shall be protected by thee, and upon thy walls shall those be defended who entreat the Most High God in repentance. And, behold, Joseph shall come to thee this day, and will see thee and shall rejoice over thee and love thee, and he will be thy bridegroom and thou shalt be his bride."

And after these things, behold, a young man of the household came, saying: "Joseph, the mighty of God, is coming to you this day." And straightway Asenath called the steward of her house, and said to him: "Make haste, and prepare my house, and get ready a nice meal, for Joseph comes to us this day." When the steward of the house saw her (her face having fallen away from her distress and weeping, and seven days' fasting), he cried sorrowfully, and taking her right hand, he kissed it, and said: "What aileth thee my mistress, for thy face has so fallen away?" And she answered the steward truly, that sleep had left her eyes.

TO BE CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK

"AND SHE CALLED THE STEWARD OF HER HOUSE"

many say that the God of the Hebrews is a truthful God, and a living God, and a gracious God, and long suffering, and very merciful and good; who considers not the sin of the humble and especially of one sinning in ignorance, and puts not to shame the lawless conduct in the time of the affliction of the distressed; further, I, too, the humbled, will turn and flee to him, and confess to him all my sins and pour out my petition before him, and he will have compassion on my suffering. For who knows that, when he sees this my humiliation and this desolation of my soul, he will have pity upon me? He will also see my suffering and protect me, since, as I hear, he is the defence of the afflicted and the help of the persecuted. Therefore I, the humble, will also undertake and cry unto him."

IV.

The Prayer of Asenath

Then Asenath stood up from the wall where she sat, and knelt upon her knees toward the east, and lifted up her eyes toward heaven, and opening her mouth she spoke to God.

"O Lord, the God of the righteous, who hast created and preserved all alive, giving the breath of life to all thy creatures; who has brought out the invisible to light and madest all things and madest visible the invisible; who hast made high the heaven and founded the earth upon the waters; who madest fast the great stones upon the abyss of the water which shall not sink, but are

JOURNEYING WITH JESUS

QUARTERLY REVIEW

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR MARCH 27

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT--ACTS 10: 38:
HE WENT ABOUT DOING GOOD

THE SHADOW OF THE CROSS

LET us on this map travel with Jesus through the scenes of his life, so far as we have gone in the past quarter's lessons, all the while resolving that we will make our life journeys like his and with him, so far as we are able.

The journeys of Jesus. At about twelve years of age from 1. Nazareth to Jerusalem and return, that he might become a son of the law; his interview with the learned doctors. (Eighteen years retirement.)

FIRST YEAR'S MINISTRY

2. Nazareth to Bethlehem, to be baptized by John.
3. Bethabara to the wilderness, when he was tempted of the devil, but "did no sin."
4. Wilderness to Bethabara, where John testified of him as the Lamb of God.
5. Bethabara to Cana, where he turned water into wine at the wedding feast.
6. Cana to Capernaum.
7. Capernaum to Passover at Jerusalem, where he cleansed the Temple of dishonest money changers; visited by Nicodemus.
8. Jerusalem to Cana, by way of Samaria; interview with the woman at the well; preached two days in Samaria, and made many converts. While himself still in Cana, healed nobleman's son in Capernaum.

SECOND YEAR'S MINISTRY

9. Cana to Nazareth; his claim that he was the Son of God rejected, and his death attempted by a mob.
10. Nazareth to Capernaum, to dwell for a year or more; preaches to multitudes by the seaside; calls Peter, Andrew, James, and John to be "fishers of men"; on the Sabbath day heals the demoniac, and Peter's wife's mother, and all other sick persons who were brought to him.
11. A tour through Eastern Galilee; the first healing of a leper.
12. To retirement for several weeks, because of the clamor created by healing of the leper.
13. From retirement to Capernaum; healed the man let down through the roof; called Matthew from his office of tax-collector to be a disciple.
14. Capernaum to Jerusalem; attended the Passover; healed the infirm man at the pool of Bethesda.
15. Return to Capernaum, great multitudes followed him to hear and be healed.
16. Capernaum to Horns of Hattin, seven miles distant; there preached Sermon on the Mount; twelve apostles chosen.
17. Return to Capernaum; Centurion's servant healed.
18. Capernaum to Nain; widow's son raised to life.
19. Return to Capernaum; his feet washed by a woman who was a sinner; dumb demoniac healed; bitter words spoken by Pharisees relative to the healing; parables spoken by seaside.
20. Capernaum to Gergesa and return; tempest stilled (Mark 4: 35-41); two demoniacs healed; evil spirits sent into the herd of swine.
21. Return to Capernaum; raised to life the daughter of Jairus; healed the woman with issue of blood; restored sight to two blind men.
22. Capernaum to Nazareth; rejected a second time at Nazareth.
23. Return to Capernaum; sent his twelve apostles out to preach in the towns and cities, and gave them power to heal, continues his tour through Galilee; death of John.

THIRD YEAR'S MINISTRY, A.D. 29

24. Capernaum to Bethsaida; feeding of five thousand; apostles sail away at his word, while he goes to a mountain top; while there in prayer, saw his apostles tossed with tempest, and walked to their relief on the water; returned from lake to plain of Gennesareth, and wrought many miracles there, near Capernaum; sermon on the bread of life.

Illustration and Application

In this age, when almost everybody makes journeys away from home, in which there is a strong tendency to let down Christian standards, it will be profitable to make the central theme of the review, CHRISTLIKE JOURNEYS. Let all our journeys be like his and with him, our going about being always a going about doing good in His Name.

Let us learn something, first of all, from the journeys of the wise men and the shepherds to the cradle of Jesus, their Saviour and King. Life's journey will be a failure if it does not include coming to Jesus. It is true wisdom, in the words of Emerson, to "hitch your wagon to a star." We should start life with high ideals. And the best ideal is an aim to be as pure, as unselfish, as brave, as manly, as Jesus Christ. "The purest among the mighty, and the mightiest among the pure." The magi were far from home, but did not make that an excuse for sin. Wise and happy are they who never do abroad what they would not do at home, but among strangers bring their golden gifts, their incense of worship, their myrrh of sorrow to the Christ.

When Jesus journeyed to Jerusalem at twelve years of age, no doubt he enjoyed the journey, the scenery, the good fellowship, the feasting, but above it all he enjoyed talking of his Father's business, with teachers learned, religious, and patriotic.

School boys and college boys of to-day may well consider Jesus among the doctors, "both hearing them and asking them questions," as a manly example, a reminder that although recreation is a duty, excessive devotion to mere was inexperienced and could not talk very well. After he sat down, an old gentleman got up and said: "Young man, you cannot preach, and you ought not to try. You ought to be ashamed of yourself." The young man rose and said: "Well, I am ashamed of myself, but I am not ashamed of my Lord." It is of ourselves that all of us have many reasons to be ashamed, but never have we had any reason to be ashamed of Christ, who is conceded even by infidels to be the noblest character the world ever saw. Let open confession of loyalty to him be to us as honorable as devotion to our country's flag, and remembering Christ's victory in the temptation, let us also refuse to surrender our flag to the enemy.

Some years ago, there was war between Italy and Austria.

During the struggle, a group of Italian soldiers, consisting of ten officers and twenty men, got separated from their regiment, and being hard pressed, entered a villa, and prepared for a desperate resistance.

They had with them the flag of the regiment. Finding it impossible to hold the villa, the Austrians set fire to it. Half suffocated by the smoke, and seeing that it would be impossible to defend themselves much longer, the Italians determined to save their flag, and this is what they did:

They stripped the bunting from the staff, and tore it into small pieces of which each officer had a portion under his clothes. The spear point was hidden under a fireplace in the house, and the staff was broken up into pieces and burnt. This done, the brave little troop surrendered.

The Italians, taken prisoners to Austria, managed to keep their precious relics secret, and one dying, his piece of bunting was buried with him.

When peace was proclaimed, and the prisoners came home, the officers of the 44th were consigned to their General by several pieces of their flag.

The spear point had already been found, and restored to the Italian army. The pieces were then sewn together by three women in the presence of officers.

Then on a certain day, the 44th was drawn up in the presence of a vast multitude, and the General restored to the assembled regiment the actual flag, stained with the blood of the hands of the brave men who had so valiantly pressed it from the enemy.

"One piece only," said the General, "is missing, and that lies in the heart of the brave man who carried it with him to the tomb."

Then while the men presented arms, and the crowd cheered, the General kissed the flag and gave it to the regiment.

Nothing ever justifies the Christian in hiding his colors, but this story pictures the faithfulness with which we all refuse to surrender our principles. If Christians were as determined never to surrender Christian principles, never to dishonor Christ, our King, as were these soldiers, how soon we could conquer the world! Let us live and die with the flag of Christ in our hearts.

All who trust in him, and live for him, enjoy peace in their hearts amid the storms of the world.

When winds are raging o'er the upper ocean,
And billows wild contend with angry roar,
'Tis said, far down beneath the wild commotion,
That peaceful stillness reigneth evermore.

So to the heart that knows thy love, O Purest!
There is a temple, sacred evermore,
And all the babble of life's angry voices,
Dies in hushed stillness at its peaceful door.

amusements is childish and sinful, and should not interfere with serious preparation for earnest living.

The next journey of Jesus of which we have any record was when he left his home and carpenter's bench to be baptized, with which let us consider also his next journey to the wilderness of temptation. Baptism is a sacrament, and sacramentum, from which we get the word, was the Roman soldier's oath of allegiance. Baptism has other meanings, but to us its pre-eminent meaning is "showing our colors" as soldiers of Christ. Why should any one to-day, when Christ is conquering the world, be ashamed to unfurl his colors? A young man who had just been converted got up in a meeting, and tried to give testimony for Jesus Christ. But he

HOME AND OUR DEAR ONES

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

BURLEY

AS OUR CHILDREN SEE US

Is it not worth while for us now and then to pause and consider what sort of impression we are making on our children? They look up to us in confidence, imitating our tones and gestures, and absorbing our opinions, adopting our views, judging of the world by what goes on within the four walls of home.

We carefully teach our children that a lie is the blackest thing on earth, and tell them over and over that nothing is so wretched and vile as deceit. Then, one day, we see approaching an acquaintance whom we do not like, or whose call is for some reason inopportune and inconvenient. And, thoughtlessly, we exclaim: "There comes Mrs. ———! Did ever any one choose such unfortunate times to visit people as she does? If she would only learn the wisdom of staying at home, and not going where she is not wanted!"

I was present one day at a domestic scene like this, and a brown-eyed maid of six, playing with her dolls in the corner, was present too. The unwelcome guest was ushered in, and the lady who had frowned and protested, met her blandly and graciously.

"Dear Mrs. ———, how very good of you to come in this cold morning. I am delighted to see you! Sit here by the fire, and let me take your wraps." The greeting was more than cordial, it was effusive. Little Jessie looked with dismayed astonishment; her whole face was an interrogation point. Scarcely had the visitor taken leave, when the child burst out: "Why, mother, you do not like that lady! You said so. And yet you were nice to her, and you kissed her when you bade her good-bye!"

"Don't be impertinent, Jessie!" was the mother's reply.

But was Jessie impertinent? Her question and comment seemed to me extremely pertinent, and inevitably her ideas of right and wrong were confused by the behavior of her mother. How should she know that there are those who fancy a society-lie justifiable, and who compromise with their conscience when they act the hypocrite, by the declaration that one must, at all costs, be polite. Many children who have been reproofed for deceitfulness, have had it stamped on their susceptible souls by the heedless conduct of their mothers and fathers, who have forgotten that example is more potent than precept. All the delinquents are not in the nursery and schoolroom. Some of them have had long training in life's various academies, and should have learned the lesson, that, everywhere and always, the simple, direct truth, spoken in love, and growing out of character, is the only right thing in the course of human intercourse.

Again: fathers and mothers preach gentleness of speech and manner; sweetness and forgiveness, to their children, and—lose their tempers with each other, speak harshly or unamiably, even descending to what the children fully understand to be squabbles about trifles, and show a most relentless spirit against those who offend them. In vain do they hold up the pure ideal in words. Their deeds educate the children in the very direction they deprecate, and which they honestly dislike and disown.

To bring children up as they should be brought, in the love and fear of God, so that they shall become good citizens, pure-hearted men and women, and agreeable companions to those nearest them in the household and community, is no slight responsibility, no light undertaking. The thought that, whether or not they mean to do so, our children cannot help judging us, should make us very watchful over our looks, words, and ways, lest haply we offend one of these little ones. We do offend them when we confuse their sense of right and wrong, and startle them from that belief in us, that is natural and instinctive in childish hearts.

For, we stand in God's place to the children. If we exact obedience from them, it is because we in turn must render it to our Heavenly Father. As we love and obey him, conscious of seeking to know and do his will, we have a right to ask from our children love and reverence. "Be ye therefore perfect, as your Heavenly Father is perfect," so run our marching orders. Only as we daily imitate our Lord, may we hope to set a copy that our little ones may safely follow.

Living Up to a Table-Cloth

"I SHALL give those MacAlisters a white table-cloth," announced Dorothy Brainard, with a positive air. Dorothy was the young Sunday School teacher of the MacAlister family, and she had tried, in vain, and in a dozen ways, to civilize them. Thus far they had resisted her efforts successfully.

Dressed in her pretty gray, tailor-made suit, trimmed with squirrel fur, she called at Number Three Hundred and Sixty-Four Avenue the next day, at half-past five.

"I've brought you a present, Mrs. MacAlister," she said, handing that good woman a flat package. "But," went on Dorothy, "I'll all take it back, Indian giver style, if you don't promise me to use it."

Few women are without an instinctive love of linen. When the white table-cloth, snow-drop pattern, satiny lustre, fine weave, was unfolded in that dingy, dirty, ill-smelling home, Annie MacAlister threw her apron over her head and cried.

"Miss Dorothy," she said, "I've not seen the like of that table-cloth since I left the old country, where I was in service, when I married Tim."

"You will put it on the table, dear?" coaxed Dorothy.

"It's far too good, Miss; but I've given you my word, and I'll not go back on it."

The table was drawn into the middle of the floor. First the floor had to be swept. Then the hearth had to be scoured. Then, broken dishes might have to be used; but Mrs. MacAlister would put only clean dishes on that white cloth. And the tribe of MacAlisters crowding in from the street and from work, grimy, unwashed, higgledy-piggledy as manners and clothes, stood open-mouthed at the splendor. One and all they had to be washed, hands and faces, before Mrs. MacAlister allowed them so much as to sit down at her table.

A good supper, hot stew, fragrant coffee, belonged to that table and that cloth.

It is the first step that costs. With the new endeavor, begun from so slight a cause, a new era began for Dorothy's friends. You see you cannot get on with just one table-cloth. You must have two. And you must replace your disgracefully cracked crockery with whole dishes. Indeed, there are lots of good things to do, if one is to live up to a white cloth on the table.

Dorothy is a practical girl, and she has the secret of helping people, by touching their pride as well as their hearts.

In the households of the poor, where the conditions are not the most favorable for cleanliness, a feeling of discouragement often creeps over a woman who was originally neat. "What is the use," she says, knowing that no matter what she does, there will be little change for the better that any one can see.

Give a bubbling, tinkling token, of early spring and budding tree.

But give her a thriving plant in a pot, or a beautiful rose from the florist's exquisite collection, a primrose or a lily, and her dormant love for beauty revives. She tries to make her poor room a shrine for the flower. And give her any precious thing, and let it be her starting-point, as was Dorothy's table-cloth. And lo! there may be no miracle, but a wonder will be wrought.

The Moccasin Evening

A YOUNG People's Society of a certain church, deciding to hold a sociable, a bright young woman proposed an Indian game as likely to be interesting. The affair was very successful, and the idea is passed on to other young people who read THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and who may like to utilize it. The young people were asked to come dressed as Indians, either men or maidens, or to wear something about them to indicate the name of some Indian, which most of them did—there being only two or three dressed in Indian costume.

The first part of the evening they spent trying to guess who each one represented. On the walls and draperies, in different parts of the rooms, were the names of cities, which were Indian in origin, printed a little obscurely, and much fun was enjoyed while deciphering and finding them out. A prize was given to the one who guessed them all first.

The names of Indian clothing, household, warfare, amusements and eatables, were given as jumbled words, and some time was spent in setting them straight. A prize was given to the one getting the most words right.

The library was arranged as an Indian reservation. In the centre of the room was a table filled with Indian curios and relics, and Indian pictures and baskets were hung all around the room. Navajo blankets served as draperies in the doors. The guests were then asked to form in line, and were marched through and given a chance to look all around them, and on leaving the room were handed pencil and paper, to write down all they observed in the room. An Indian wigwag was given to the one remembering the most, and a small drum to the one remembering the least number.

And now for the moccasins. They were two peanut-shells, cut in moccasin shape and stained inside with red ink, then tied on one corner of a plain calling card. On the cards were written quotations about moccasins and snow-shoes. (The quotations being found in "Hiawatha.") By matching quotations, partners were found for supper. During the supper, the musically inclined found their way to the piano and played Indian dance music, such as "Hiawatha," "Kick-a-poo," "Pow-wow," etc. The supper was of real Indian style, consisting of corn-bread, wienerwurst, cheese, pickles, ham sandwiches and coffee.

A few jumbled words as a suggestion: Socsincam (moccasins), kabnetl (blanket), esabd (beads), gawmiw (wigwag), tesletk (kettles), kissn (skins), warsor (arrows), hotkamaw (tomahawk), tarshefe (feathers), situquo (quoits), labl (ball).

Among the Macedonian Refugees

PASTOR POPOFF'S TOUR OF THE BORDER VILLAGES
AND ITS RESULTS—LETTERS FROM NATIVE PASTORS

OUR relief work progresses satisfactorily in Macedonia and along the Bulgarian border. Pastor Popoff, and his associates on THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Committee, are laboring most energetically and systematically to reach the centres of greatest need, and the reports received by last week's mail show how they are succeeding. The greatest need at the moment is clothing and bed covering. Food is supplied through the generosity of local committees, chiefly in the Bulgarian towns and villages.

Our representative is now making an extended tour of the border districts among the refugees, and reports the most urgent need at Banya, Kostenetz, Lujene, Tatar, Pazardjik (and twenty two adjacent villages), Stanimaka (and adjacent villages), keeps a woman busy nearly a week, they get six piasters (twenty-four cents). M. N. POPOFF.

From Yambol, Rev. Mr. Hristoff writes: "The refugees have been supplied with bread only and fuel. All of them need shoes. We have about six hundred of them. To supply them with shoes and sandals, we need one thousand five hundred francs. Our refugees have had only bread. The committee can give us some money for beans and some other eatables. As for bedding, they have been partly supplied."

Mr. Vassil P. Karaivanoff, of Dubnitsa, writes, under date of Feb. 8:

"The Turks have lately burned a house in Banseo, Macedonia, and killed the owner. This caused a great panic in the town, and fifty or sixty people having run away; I am told that they are now in Rilo Monastery. At the same time, people are running away from Mehomia. Last night, forty refugees from that town arrived in Dubnitsa. I met them and questioned them. The Bulgarian quarter and Samokov. At least $7,000, he estimates, will be required to supply immediate needs in clothing and shoes. Many of the sufferers are almost literally in rags, and barefooted, and the condition of the women and children is truly pitiable. Some relief has been already afforded, over a very widely distributed area, with the money already sent through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund.

From Tatar Pazardjik, Pastor Popoff writes:

This is a city of about 14,000 population. Here are in twenty-two villages in the vicinity there are 1,500 refugees. Rev. L. Mireheff, a native pastor of Monastir, Macedonia, accompanied me in visiting the refugees. One of the most active members of the local relief committee, is Dr. Dimitri Kifotis, a Greek by race, and military doctor in the Bulgarian army. The Bulgarian government here, as elsewhere, is providing food for the refugees. They are given bread and other provisions (35 centimes, or 7 cents worth per day). The committee spends $3.150 per month for the 1,500 refugees for food. The refugees come once a week to the bread depot, and get food for a week. On account of the appropriation being exhausted, the committee gives now only bread, having discontinued cooked food. Now and then they give the refugees a little beans or lentils. The committee has given no clothing at all, but Mrs. King Louis and other relief agencies have distributed some clothing, mostly in the city. The most urgent need here is clothing. Dr. Kifotis estimates that to provide this need, about 45,000 francs ($9,000), would be needed.

I send you a picture taken specially for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. These refugees all live in one building—about 150 in all. Of course the picture does not show all. The picture was taken, as you will observe, while I was telling them what THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers and other benevolent people were doing for them in relieving their distress. They seemed to be greatly surprised that people so far from them, and not knowing them, should show such sympathy toward them. I explained that it was love to Christ that prompted them to do so.

In a deserted coffee-shop, I found forty refugees—men, women, children, marriageable girls and young men—all crowded together. At night they spread whatever they have on the floor, and rest there. The women were spinning wool. I asked them who gave them wool. They said: "It is not ours; we get it from the city women to spin for them. We prefer to have something to do, rather than be idle, although they pay us but very little." For spinning an oke (three pounds) of wool, which in Mehomia was burned last fall. They tell me that many more will run away as soon as the weather permits. Besides the many other ways of torturing the people, the Turks have imposed new taxes on things, which, thus far, had not been taxed, and the old taxes have been increased."

The Rev. Stephen Thomoff, pastor of the M. E. Church at Varna, writes:

"At the request of Mr. Popoff, I send the following information in regard to the refugees of Varna and vicinity. In the town of Varna, there are 222 families of refugees—728 persons—of whom 313 are men and 415 women. Of these, 441 are adults, and 287 children (under 15 years of age). In more than 40 villages of the Varna district, there are 489 families of 1,994 persons, of whom 939 are men and 1,056 women, or 1,250 adults and 744 children (under 15 years of age). Besides these, there are 269 single men, who often apply to the committee for help. Counting these, we have the grand total of 3,064 refugees in Varna and vicinity.

"The refugees in Varna are cared for by a Relief Committee, of which the chairman is the Mayor. This committee collects contributions and clothing from the people in the town and district. Benevolent persons from England sent some bales of clothing two months ago, consisting of blankets, which were distributed by the committee to the refugees. There were also a few women's dresses.

"Bread is distributed to the refugees every day. Most of them, both in the town and villages, are without shoes and stockings, and in spite of the efforts of the committee, this great need of the refugees has not yet been fully supplied. All the refugees stand in need of more food, clothing and shoes."

The Martyrs' Memorial for China

TO worthily commemorate the 212 adults and children of eighteen missionary societies, who died martyr deaths for Christ in China during the century, and also the thousands of natives who shared the same fate, the missionaries of over sixty societies now desire to erect a memorial in Shanghai. They have agreed that this should take the form of a hall, in which living witnesses may carry on the testimony of the martyrs. This will be a centenary thank-offering, an expression of the unity of the church and a perpetual witness at the entrance to China that China has a martyr church. Rev. Arthur H. Smith, D.D., the greatest living authority on China, says: "It will embody and prove that unity which must be the note of the triumphant missionary movement of the twentieth century. It will accomplish a maximum of good with a moderate outlay."

The movement to erect a Martyrs' Memorial began in the spring of 1903. The proposed Hall will be an Interdenominational Union Hall for Chinese meetings, with offices for Bible and Tract Societies, the rental of which will form an endowment for the maintenance of the Hall. The building is to be sacred to Christian uses only, and will be held by a Board of Trustees elected by the missionary body. The idea originated in the Shanghai Missionary Association, and the scheme elicited the hearty endorsement of leading missionaries of over fifty societies. The Memorial Committee consists of the original committee in Shanghai, with the addition of special representatives from the societies which had martyrs, and corresponding members from each of sixty-two societies.

Such a Hall has been needed for years, and this need increases with the growth of the native church and the expansion of the missionary enterprise. The new auditorium will hold from 2,000 to 3,000 people. At present there is not even a small hall in Shanghai open to the Chinese, and the churches and chapels hold but a few hundreds each. In the new Hall the native Christians will hold their monthly union meetings, special evangelistic efforts on a large scale to reach the Chinese masses would be possible under the auspices of the various missions, and national conferences could be accommodated. A reading room will form a valuable feature. The tablets of the martyrs will be a constant education in the duty of witness-bearing even unto death.

For this project $125,000 is asked from America. Remittances may be made payable to Alex. S. Webb, Honorary Treasurer, 44 Wall street, New York City, who will forward all donations to Shanghai, China, through the Hong Kong and Shanghai Banking Corporation, 50 Wall street, New York.

INDIA'S GREAT FAMINE*

Dr. J. E. Scott's Story of the Struggle he Witnessed with the Famine of 1900

READERS of this journal have a personal interest in the new book issued by Messrs. Harper & Brothers, of New York, in which Rev. J. E. Scott, tells the wonderful story of the fight with famine in India, the horrors of which were, as he shows, so nobly mitigated by the gifts made in response to the appeals of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and by the services rendered by its proprietor, Dr. Louis Klopsch, who visited India and personally investigated the condition of the sufferers. Dr. Scott says: "As Chairman of one Famine Relief Committee, and member of several others, I was jointly responsible for the distribution of several hundreds of thousands of dollars, mostly contributed by the people of America. These kind donors have a right to know what became of their contributions. I have therefore endeavored, in this book, to give an account of famine relief."

"The famine area of 1899-1900," says Dr. Scott, "covered more than 400,000 square miles and affected 60,000,000 persons. When the famine was at its worst, nearly 2,500,000 persons were on the relief works, and about 5,000,000 were receiving outside relief." The Government spent in relief over $32,000,000, besides lending money to the rulers of adjacent States which were similarly affected, whose rulers were thus encouraged to undertake relief measures. The Government also gave remission of taxes, which, combined with the money spent, made the aggregate loss to the Government by the famine more than fifty million dollars.

Dr. Scott, mentions with deep gratitude, the arrival of the Quito, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD steamer, which the readers of this journal had filled with corn for the famine-stricken people, with which, he says, "Our Committee kept thousands alive for months." He was much affected, too, by the record published in our columns at the time, of the self-denial of the contributors to the Fund. A number of these appear in his book, and it is very gratifying to know that in a work which will become historical, these instances of people, some of them mere children, giving up luxuries and pleasures that they might help to feed the destitute people of India, receive permanent recognition.

The scene at Ajmir, when THE CHRISTIAN HERALD corn arrived, as Dr. Scott witnessed it, will rejoice the hearts of many whose gifts helped to fill that steamer. He says: "During the famine, Ajmir was one of the chief centres from which we carried our relief to the stricken people in the villages. Two thousand bags of corn, just unloaded from the steamship Quito and put down at the door, prepaid, found here ready hands, moved by grateful hearts, ready to distribute; and by bullock cart and by railroad train and on stately camel went into many a town and village to feed the hungry—this food, sanctified and blessed by the prayers of many donors. At all our shops we sold the corn in small quantities to all who were needy, but able to purchase, and gave to those who had no means of paying." Dr. Scott explains that in the cases in which the corn was sold, the purchasers were unable to pay the prices asked by the dealers, but were quite able to pay the normal rate asked by the missionaries, and the money they paid was speedily used in giving further relief to people who were utterly destitute. Thus the generous gift from America was economized so as to do more good to the most needy sufferers, than if it had all been given free even to those who could afford to pay something for it.

The work for the orphans, naturally forms an element in Dr. Scott's valuable history. He says: "The paramount duty now devolving on those who made it possible to rescue starving waifs from death, and often from worse than death, is the support and training of the ten thousand famine-stricken, mostly children, some of them widows, who are gathered into the orphanages. These institutions will become, in time, it is hoped, partly, if not altogether, self-supporting, but in the meantime these waifs, many of whom will develop into useful members of society, are dependent on the charity of the disciples of Him who said, 'Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto me.'"

*In Famine Land, by Rev. J. E. Scott. A graphic portrayal of famine-stricken India, as seen by an American missionary living among the people during the awful distress of 1899-1900. Illustrated with photographs and map. Pp. 206. Price, $2.50. Published by Harper & Brothers, New York.

SPECIAL NOTICE

W. M. G. Macungie, Pa. I was talking with a farmer yesterday, in regard to farmers' help. All are complaining that they are unable to get anybody to work on the farm, nor a girl for doing housework. The thought struck me, could we not get some of these poor Macedonian people to come to the United States, where there is room for good young men and girls on the farm and in the kitchen, at good wages. What do you think about it?

We do not think favorably of the suggestion. The Macedonians will do very well in their own land, if the proposed scheme of reforms goes through, which seems probable. Besides, they would very likely be greatly out of place here, penniless, in a strange land, and unable to make themselves understood, except through interpreters. The present tendency is to restrict, rather than to encourage, that class of immigration.

J. E. M., North Robinson, O. Where a congregation has decided to erect a new church building and has selected a new location, would the trustees be justified in disposing of the old property to a person who intends to use it for a bottling works?

It is just possible that there might be a misunderstanding here. It might be for bottling milk or drugs or soda water, or it might be for intoxicating liquors. To turn a church building to trade is always a sad transformation; but if the business be a clean and an unexceptionable one, there can be no moral objection.

Mr. J. F. Cantwell, Worthington, Ind., writes: My wife and I have been married over fifty years. We were married in 1850. Our ages are seventy-four and seventy-five. We united with the Presbyterian Church in 1852, and are trying to live consistent Christian lives.

An admirable record, and worthy of all respect.

Mrs. R. N. McC., Flushing, Mich. What is the population and area of Japan? Tell me something of the home life of the people. How is the Mikado's name "Mustohito" pronounced?

Population about 35,000,000. The Empire of Japan consists of a long chain of islands. It is difficult to give a correct estimate of area, owing to lack of reliable surveys. An estimate, founded upon maps, which are far from accurate, gives a total of 148,742 miles. The religion is Shinto or Buddhist. The former is the religious belief of the natives prior to the introduction of Buddhism and Confucian philosophy. Since foreigners have been admitted into the country, various Christian missions have been established, churches have been built and schools opened. The native houses are constructed of wood, with tiled roofs, and the floors are covered with thick, large straw mats. The doors are formed of sliding screens, sometimes covered with embroidered silk. The front of the dwelling is generally left open or closed with ornamental grille work. There is a garden at the front, and another at the back, the people are very fond of flowers. The Japanese are a cleanly people, bathing very often. They are gentle in manner and very polite. The women are amiable, and devoted to their husbands and children. The Emperor's name is pronounced as if spelled "Mootsoohito."

J. C. F., Manawa, Wis. Is there a record kept at Washington of those that served in the Revolutionary War?

Address a letter of inquiry to War Department, Washington, D. C.

Mrs. V. C., Winston, N. C. Please explain how standard time is gotten from Washington, and how received throughout the country?

What is known as the "new standard time," was adopted by agreement by all the principal railroads of the United States at 12 o'clock noon, on November 18th, 1883. The system divides the continent into five longitudinal belts, and fixes a meridian of time for each belt. These meridians are fifteen degrees of longitude, corresponding to one hour of time apart. Eastern Maine, New Brunswick, and Nova Scotia use the sixtieth meridian. The Canadian, New England, and the Middle States, Virginia and the Carolinas, use the seventy-fifth meridian, which is that of Philadelphia. The States of the Mississippi Valley, Alabama, Georgia, Florida, and Westward, including Texas, Kansas, and the larger part of Nebraska and Dakota, use the ninetyeth meridian, which is that of New Orleans. The Territories to the western border of Arizona and Montana go by the time of the 105th meridian, which is that of Denver, and the Pacific States employ the 120th meridian. The time divisions are known as intercolonial time, Eastern time, central time, mountain time, and Pacific time. A traveler passing from one time belt to another will find his watch an hour too fast or too slow, according to the direction in which he is going. All points in any time division using the time of the meridian must set their time-pieces faster or slower than the time indicated by the sun, according as their position is east or west of the line. This change of system reduced the time standards used by the railroads from fifty-three to five, a great convenience to the railroads and the traveling public. The suggestion leading to the adoption of this new system originated with Professor Abbe, of the Signal Bureau, at Washington.

Osborn. Should a Christian minister mention publicly and draw lessons from deaths caused by rum in his community?

If he avoids names and personal allusions, we see no good reason why he should allow the opportunity of pointing the lesson to pass unimproved. He could do no better service to society than to expose the demoralizing and deadly effects of the rum traffic. It is his duty to speak out, but not to become personal, or to indicate individuals by name or by unmistakable reference.

Subscriber, Kokomo, Ind. 1. What is that something which some people call "stock"? I have noticed that some of the fine English stock is intensely worldly and not infrequently dissolute. Are there two kinds of stock, one of them religious? 2. Is it the belief of Christian scholars that God does not bestow talents or genius except where there is excellent "stock" to receive?

1. "Come of good stock," i.e., family, parentage, or lineage, is a phrase applied to those whose ancestry bore an irreproachable character, or were prominent and respected in the locality where they resided. It is a rather vague term nowadays. Applied in Europe, it means that the person comes of an old, well-established family, of which he is proud to be a descendant, even though he may be a degenerate one. Here, it means that the individual comes of good pioneer parentage, a descendant of some branch of the early settler families, of Puritan, or Cavalier, or Dutch descent; or it may mean simply that he is of good, respectable parentage. After all, it makes little difference, since the man must be judged by what he is and not by his ancestors' merits. Modern common sense "smiles at the claims of long descent," when these are unsupported by personal present worth. Many of our greatest Americans have sprung from obscure parentage. 2. We do not believe that talent or genius depend to any great extent upon "descent," although good qualities may certainly be transmitted.

Elias, Fairmount, Ind. What was the name of the priest that bought the Potter's Field, as described in Acts 1, verse 18?

In Acts 1: 18, 19, it is stated that the purchase was made by Judas himself. In Matt. 27: 7, the priests are said to have been the purchasers. The high priesthood that year was divided between Annas and Caiaphas. One of the priests next in authority may have been the actual purchaser. No name is disclosed.

A. K., Pleasant Hill, Md. Where did the Indians live prior to their nativity in America? Did they live in Asia? Does history tell how they got to this country? Did they ever serve as slaves to the Egyptians and work on the pyramids?

Some authorities hold that the North American Indian came to this country from Asia, crossing at Behrings Straits, for their implements and modes of life seem to connect them with the peoples of the Eastern Continent, whose relics are still found in the mounds and shell heaps along the base of the Rocky Mountains. History does not tell us whether or not the Indians were ever slaves, and it is a mere matter of speculation as to whether they may have helped in the building of the Pyramids, or were subject in any way to the Egyptians.

Mrs. J. E. N., Greenville, N. H. Please give me the meaning of "Parsifal."

"Parsifal" is the title of a sacred opera, written by Richard Wagner. It was the great composer's last work and by many people considered his best. The opera is based upon the story of the Holy Grail. The first performances of the opera took place in Bayreuth, in 1882, under the composer's own direction. It has recently been given in this country, against the will and in direct opposition to the wishes of Mme. Wagner.

Elwood K., Matawan, N. Y. Where can I get the facts for comparing the present winter temperatures with former winters?

From the Weather Bureau, Washington, D. C. The winter now closing has been the coldest ever known since the Bureau was established. The mean temperature has been 26 degrees. December's mean temperature was 30 degrees, 4 degrees below normal;

January's, 24 degrees, 6 degrees below normal, and February's, 25 degrees, also 6 degrees below normal. The next coldest winter was 1874-75, with a mean temperature of 27 degrees. A. P., Jacksonville, Tex. A number of years ago, I saw in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD an account of the finding of an ancient writing in Thibet, which purported to be, or was thought to be, a history of the life of Jesus from the time of his boyhood until shortly before his reappearance at his baptism. Can you tell me anything about it?

It was pronounced spurious, and the work of some foreigner, who claimed to have found there. The best authorities repudiated it as literary forgery.

R. M., Ottawa, Kan. Why is it that New York puts up with such buildings as "Lung Block," and has such wretched places for people to live in?

"Lung Block" is a "left-over"—a relic of the old days of unimproved tenements. Such places are now fast disappearing.

O. W., Ouray, Colo. 1. What are the names of the Books in the Apocrypha? 2. Why were they omitted from our Bibles? 3. Are the character and disposition of a person affected by the planet that was dominant at the time of his birth?

1. Esdras; Tobit; Judith; chapters additional to Esther; The Wisdom of Solomon; ecclesiasticus; Baruch; The Song of the Holy Children; The History of Susanna; Bel and the Dragon; the Prayer of Manasses, and Iacabees. 2. Because they lacked evidence of being of divine inspiration. They were never regarded as being of equal authority with those included in our Bibles, and as scholarship advanced, respect for them decreased. 3. Astrology is based on that theory, at there is no evidence to support it.

Reader, Butler, Ill. If you read carefully and thoughtfully in Acts 8:9 to 24, you will understand the attitude of earnest Christians toward those that would use the religion of Christ as a means of making money. It is truly our duty to see to it that persons of the type that would turn the most sacred things to common merchandise, are discouraged in their efforts.

Mrs. S. L. R., Jacksonville, Fla. 1. Never heard of it. It was probably a novel. 2. Not in the Scriptures.

Mrs. M. J. P., Sault Ste. Marie, Mich. The quotation has been attributed to Laurence Sterne, but its authorship is uncertain.

F. E. F., Seaboard, N. C. Alfred Tennyson was the author of the poem, two lines of which you quote. It is entitled, "Break, Break, Break."

H. L. H., Fergusonville, N. Y. Faber, the hymnologist, joined the Romish Church in 1845. He was doubtless induced by the example of Newman.

Any one knowing the present address of William A. Van Kirk, of West Newton, Pa., is requested to send the same to Mary H. Van Kirk, West Newton, Pa.

Old copies and back issues of this paper may be sent to Rev. C. W. Higgins, Westminster Mission, Salt Lake City, Utah, for distribution in Gospel work.

Charles H., Paradise, Pa. The music-teacher must be paid for his labor, and it is entirely right that the pupils should pay, if they are able. The rate seems remarkably reasonable.

Mary A. Rothschilds took their name and title of nobility from a red shield ("roth schild"), which swung from the Frankfurt house of Mayer Arnshel, the founder of the family's fortunes.

F. K., Cincinnati, O. See Cushing's Manual or Reed's Rules of Debate in any library. An amendment to "strike out the enacting clause," or any particular phrase of the motion, would be in order.

Mrs. Anna C. W., Union Star, Mo. All card games and games of chance are better avoided. They do no good, and may do infinite harm, through example, if in no other way.

S. D. J., Wellman, Ia. Our remittances for the Macedonian Relief work are sent through the American Board at Constantinople, which conveys them safely to the missionaries at the desired points in the interior.

John F., West Berkeley, Calif. Read Ancient Egypt, by Rawlinson; Troja, by Prof. Schliemann; also the works of Profs. Hilprecht and Flinders Petrie. These are the best for your purpose. Any good bookseller will procure them.

C. L. A., Midvale, O. 1. In divorce cases, where the wife gets the decree, it is usually optional with her to resume her own name or to retain her married name. There would be a decided incongruity in calling a divorced woman "Miss."

Eva E. C., Kirtley, Wyo. 1. The Bowery Mission is supported by the proprietor of this paper, and by the voluntary contributions of readers everywhere, who are pleased to have a share in its work. 2. If all Christians were to unite in working and praying for real temperance reform, wonderful results would be accomplished.

Mrs. E. L., Anabel, Mo. There is no present likelihood of the Far Eastern conflict resulting in a universal war. We do not see how any one can connect it with Armageddon. That "last great war" when it does come, will probably be a result of the dismemberment of Turkey.

They feared they had made a mistake, and that they would get no audience. To their amazement, long before the appointed hour the place was thronged, the boat was filled to the verge of suffocation, and, in addition, the landing stage and the shore were crowded with attentive listeners. The people seemed to spring out of the ground, many of them had come seven or ten kilometres [four to six miles]; they calculated that there must have been 700 present.

In the evening, our last, another delightful meeting; the children ranged on the platform steps to make room. The pastor, who had arrived from Paris that day, as an old friend of ours, and after his own address, he gave us the opportunity of adding our testimony and saying a few words. Oh what a joy it was to "tell the old, old story of Jesus and his love"—dearer to us than life itself—to those to whom it was not the oft-told tale, but to whom it came in all the power of its first freshness.

We returned home next day, thanking God for these manifest proofs that he is working in our midst. May we ask our readers to be "fellow-helpers with us," both in prayer for continued and deepened blessing, and also in doing their part in answering their own prayers by contributing of their substance in order that the mission, instead of being forced to curtail his work, may, on the contrary, be enabled to extend it, till in every remote corner of France, the good news of a free salvation and an open Bible may be sounded forth, and that thus in the great "Harvest Home," sowers and reapers may rejoice together.

Intelligence of Animals

In Chicago, Mrs. McNeill was soundly sleeping alone in her cottage. Suddenly she was awakened by her cat, who jumped on her bed and clawed at her arm. She then found the room was full of smoke, and without stopping to dress, she barely escaped from the burning house.

A little black and white fox-terrier saved the lives of Mr. and Mrs. Pickering, of East Manchester, N. H. He forced open the door of their sleeping room, and barked so vigorously that he awakened them, when they found their room was bright with the reflection of a fire in the factory attached to their residence. They escaped in their night-clothes, walking through the snow to the nearest house; the dog, which was a great pet, having undoubtedly saved them from suffocation in the burning building.

A little dog ran up to a door in the rear of a cottage in Detroit, Mich., and whined pitifully. A neighbor thought the animal's action was peculiar, notified the police, who discovered Sarah Boody, almost asphyxiated from the fumes of a coal stove.

Charles A. Mills, his wife and two children had a narrow escape from being suffocated by coal gas at Norristown Pa., and they probably owe their lives to the family watchdog. When Mills, a barber, awoke at three o'clock, and started to investigate the continued barking of a dog in the kitchen, he found the house filled with gas from the kitchen stove, and himself too weak to move about. He staggered through the house, opening the windows as he went, and with difficulty aroused and saved his wife and two children.

MISSIONARY TESTIMONY*

Brief Extracts From the Reports of Missionaries on the Foreign Field

THE true rule of blessing on missionary work is thus stated by Dr. Goodrich: “The zeal for foreign missions of the nineteenth century as of the first century, has been twice blessed—blessing the heathen with Christian salvation and blessing the home church with a larger faith.”

Rev. J. P. Jones, of the Madura Mission, in India, writes that in his largest congregation the average income per family is five rupees ($1.66) a month, which is thirty-three cents a month for each member of the family. Yet the members of that mission have contributed this year, seventy-five cents per member, as their church offering. What would be the gifts of some wealthy churches at home if each member gave the same proportion of his income?

There are in foreign mission lands 535 native churches under the care of native pastors, who report accessions of membership during the past year averaging 110 to each church. The reports of our own churches at home are not often so favorable as this; yet people often ask if it really pays to send missionaries to heathen lands.

The native heathen are beginning to recognize the vital power of Christianity. Dr. A. E. Richardson, of Hausaland, writes that a Hausa priest recently said to him: “We have those ten commandments which adorn your religion; but there is this difference: you Christians have some power which enables you to keep the commandments; we Moslems have no power to resist breaking them.”

Mr. Kiichi Kaneko, of Japan, writes: “Japan needs to be evangelized. The religious development must come from its inner side, just as men cannot be forced to believe this or that creed unless his mental condition is ready to accept it. So with regard to a nation. Japan needs the new light, and the new life.”

Rev. Hunter Corbett says: “I may have buried my life in China, but this I know, that at this moment there are at least two thousand converts there who are daily praying to God for me.”

Dr. Judson Smith writes: “As plain as the signs that gathered about the advent of our Lord, are the signs that gather about us that God is giving to this generation a new summons, and a glorious opportunity to win the world to our Redeemer. We know the Divine purpose, we see the field. Our hosts are ready; the march has begun, and it is for us to determine what our share shall be in the struggle and in the victory.”

Deafness Overcome

A Device That Is Scientific, Simple, Direct, and Instantly Restores Hearing in Even the Oldest Person—Comfortable, Invisible and Perfect Fitting.

190 Page Book Containing a History of the Discovery and Many Hundred Signed Testimonials from All Parts of the World—SENT FREE.

The True Story of The Invention of Wilson's Common Sense Ear Drums Told by George H. Wilson, the Inventor.

I was deaf from infancy. Eminent doctors, surgeons and ear specialists treated me at great expense and yet did me no good. I tried all the artificial appliances that claimed to restore hearing, but they failed to benefit me in the least. I even went to the best specialists in the world, but their efforts were unavailing.

My case was pronounced incurable!

I grew desperate; my deafness tormented me. Daily I was becoming more of a recluse, avoiding the companionship of people because of the annoyance my deafness and sensitiveness caused me. Finally I began to experiment on myself, and after patient years of study, labor and personal expense, I perfected something that I found took the place of the natural ear drums, and I called it Wilson's Common Sense Ear Drum, which I now wear day and night with perfect comfort, and do not even have to remove them when washing. No one can tell I am wearing them, as they do not show, and as they give no discomfort whatever, I scarcely know it myself.

With these drums I can now hear a whisper. I join in the general conversation and hear everything going on around me. I can hear a sermon or lecture from any part of a large church or hall. My general health is improved because of the great change my Ear Drums have made in my life. My spirits are bright and cheerful. I am a relieved, changed man.

Since my fortunate discovery it is no longer necessary for any deaf person to carry a trumpet, a tube, or any other such old-fashioned makeshift. My Common Sense Ear Drum is built on the strictest scientific principles, contains no metal, wires, or strings of any kind, and is entirely new and up to date in all respects. It is so small that no one can see it when in position, yet it collects all the sound waves and focuses them against the drum head, causing you to hear naturally and perfectly. It will do this even when the natural ear drums are partially or entirely destroyed, perforated, scarred, relaxed, or thickened. It fits any ear from childhood to old age, male or female, and aside from the fact that it does not show, it never causes the least irritation, and can be used with comfort day and night without removal for any cause.

With my device I can overcome deafness in any person, no matter how acquired, whether from catarrh, scarlet fever, typhoid or brain fever, measles, whooping cough, gatherings in the ear, shocks from artillery, or through accidents. My invention not only overcomes, but at once stops the progress of deafness and all roaring and buzzing noises. The greatest aural surgeons in the world recommend it, as well as physicians of all schools. It will do for you what no medicine or medical skill on earth can do.

I want to place my 190 page book on deafness in the hands of every deaf person in the world. I will gladly send it free to anyone whose name and address I can get. It describes and illustrates Wilson's Common Sense Ear Drums and contains bona fide letters from numerous users in the United States, Canada, Mexico, England, Scotland, Ireland, Wales, Australia, New Zealand, Tasmania, India, and the remotest islands. I have letters from people in every station of life—ministers, physicians, lawyers, merchants, society ladies, etc.—and tell the truth about the benefits to be derived from my wonderful little device. You will find the names of people in your own town and state, many whose names you know, and I am sure that all this will convince you that the remedy for deafness has at last been solved by my invention.

Don't delay; write for the free book today and address my firm: The Wilson Ear Drum Co., 1599 Todd Building, Louisville, Ky., U. S. A.

Christ's Twofold Ministry

His Work for the Whole of Human Nature

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

OUR Lord's life had many aspects. Let us see him at Nazareth. He had been preaching and healing, and his fame had gone abroad. But instead of continuing where the crowds had hung upon his words, and glorified God for the miracles he wrought, he went at his Father's call to Nazareth, where he had been brought up. The people of Nazareth had had an exceptional opportunity to observe him. They must have seen in him something unusual. Reading his young life in the light of the glimpse we have of him in the Temple, we can gather two things: first, his complete obedience to Joseph and Mary, and that he took the place of a peasant child among those whom he would meet with in the school or in the usual intercourse with other children, asserting no superiority to them, doing as they did, learning as they, helping in the home life as they. There is no qualification of the expression in the Gospel of Luke, that he "was subject to them."

Secondly, in the incident at Jerusalem we may see something else. The things of his Father, the Scriptures, were his things. He knew already from the Scriptures many of the things concerning himself; and we may well believe that the roll of the Scripture which he opened in the synagogue (Luke 4: 17), where he "found the place," was a roll very well known to him. Probably his recreation was to go into the synagogue and read and reread the Holy Scripture. It could not have been anything else than the Scripture on which the scribes in the temple questioned him. It must have been his knowledge of Scripture which made them astonished at his understanding and answers. Surely the men of Nazareth must have marked his love for and his acquaintance with the Scriptures; they must have seen in him, as in no other, a life regulated by the Word of God, and a spirit, so under its influence, that it must have been noticeable. They may have heard the story of the wise men and of the shepherds, but they did not stir themselves up to inquire and to discover who this unusual Child was that had grown up among them. Thus, when he read the Scripture concerning himself, and said: "This day is this Scripture fulfilled in your ears," they were offended that he whom they had known as the son of Joseph and Mary, should be, as they thought, so presumptuous in his claim to be the Subject of Isaiah 61, and he would not further harden their hearts by doing there the miracles he had done elsewhere—because of their unbelief.

But there were those who did believe—and He called the four disciples, Andrew and Peter, James and John, and they followed him to Capernaum, where he took up his abode in Peter's house. Here his work of power on soul and body was abundantly manifested, the preaching and healing went on together; and he could show how fully he was the Saviour of the whole man. He taught, he cast out devils, he raised Peter's mother-in-law from her sick-bed, and, at even, as the Sabbath was over, crowds came round him, and he healed all that were sick, to fulfil the word of Isaiah 53: 4. Himself took our infirmities and bare our sicknesses. We next find him again in Capernaum, where they brought him the paralytic, and, in this case, he showed very specially his ministry to the whole man, saying to him, "Son, be of good cheer; thy sins be forgiven thee" (Matt. 9: 2), and then, when the Pharisees began to murmur, he asked them, "Whether is it easier to say unto the sick of the palsy, Thy sins be forgiven thee, or to say, Arise, take up thy bed and walk? But that ye may know that the Son of Man hath power on earth to forgive sins, he saith to the sick of the palsy, I say unto thee, Arise, and take up thy bed, and go thy way into thine house." It was his twofold ministry exercised on the same person.

Again, we see him meeting the accusations of the authorities, about his breaking the Sabbath. He came to bring the Sabbath into our lives. It was to be no longer merely a legal thing. When he cast out the unclean spirit on the Sabbath, what a Sabbath that must have been to the no-longer-tormented victim!

The Right Way to Paint Cheap

And Have it Look Better, Wear Longer and Cost Less Than the Best White Lead Paint.

Fifty Sample Colors and Illustrated Booklet Prepaid to Any Address Absolutely Free.

The cost of painting is a heavy burden. Cheap paints soon fade, peel or scale off and white lead and oil costs so much and has to be replaced so often that it is a constant expense to keep the bright, clean appearance so desirable in the cosy cottage home or the elegant mansion.

CARRARA PAINT is increasing in popularity and use at an enormous rate. Last year over one million gallons were used in this country, and over fifty thousand houses were covered with it. The buildings and magnificent hotels of our largest cities, the palaces of our millionaires and cottages of our workmen, the farm houses, barns, store buildings, factories, mills, elevators, warehouses, machine shops, depots and roundhouses are being painted everyday throughout the length and breadth of the land with CARRARA PAINT because it has proven best.

You can use CARRARA with a feeling of security that it has stood the test and has given satisfaction in all places where paint is used. Its universal popularity with all people and the satisfactory service it has given on all classes of buildings give you positive assurance that you are getting the best and cheapest when you buy CARRARA.

There is but one CARRARA. It is made by the Carrara Paint Agency, 58 Carrara Bldg., Cincinnati, Ohio. Anyone having anything to paint should send for fifty free sample colors and our handsome, illustrated booklet, showing many buildings reproduced in all the colors just as they are painted with this great paint. Distributing depots in all principal cities. Write-to-day telling us what you have to paint and we will show you how to beautify your property and save half your paint bills in the future.

Field and Garden

New Seed and Floral Catalogues for the Season of 1904

Burpee's Farm Annual. Twenty-eighth year of this excellent publication. Burpee's Fordhook Farms, are the largest trial grounds in America.
Here are grown all sorts of delicious vegetable products. Here is the home of the early jewel tomato, the new golden globe onion, the famous Fordhook cucumber, golden beauty corn and Vermont gold coin potato. Burpee's new creations in flower seeds, form an interesting chapter. There are three different varieties of the new ivy-leaved nasturtium shown. "Burpee's seeds that grow," are sold only under seal. W. Atlee Burpee & Co., Phila., Pa.

If you wish to see gladioli in their glory, consult the back cover of John Lewis Childs' catalogue, Rare Flowers, Vegetables and Fruits. Scattered all through the book are descriptions of the most rare and beautiful flowers, vines and shrubs. The bulbous plants show many new and interesting varieties, the giant gladioli taking first rank. The rosy nugget watermelon which adorns one page, shows an artistic bit of coloring and looks "good enough to eat." Very novel and beautiful is a group of giant rainbow-leaved coleus. The Childs' seeds and plants have stood the test of time and experience. John Lewis Childs, Floral Park, N.Y.

J. Roscoe Fuller & Co., seedsmen and florists, Floral Park, N.Y., are out with their Garden Annual for 1904. The new peachbloss and double crimson hibiscus head the list of floral beauties, while the cornflower aster are close second. As a border plant the latter is most satisfactory. The curled and crested zinnia shows a flower with its petals curled and twisted in a most fantastic manner. Some beautiful geraniums are shown, grown from seed; one called a pansy geranium, is of easy growth, and is literally covered with flowers all the time, requiring very little attention. It is especially recommended as a window plant. J. Roscoe Fuller & Co., Floral Park, N.Y.

Everything for the Garden for 1904, published by Peter Henderson, is filled from cover to cover with beautiful engravings, and descriptions of vegetables and flowers. The colored plates are fairly gorgeous with their wealth of color, a collection of dahlias being especially attractive. A page filled with lovely hardy, everblooming roses are so well represented that one can almost lift them from the paper, so natural are they in their varicolored beauty. It is truly a "charming" collection. An automobile covered with sweet peas, shows what may be done in the way of decoration with this fragrant flower. One page devoted to onions, colored to life in delicate yellows and reds, shows that flowers are not alone in the possession of beautiful tints. The catalogue is most artistic and attractive from cover to cover. Peter Henderson, 35-37 Cortlandt street, New York City.

From the Wagner Park Conservatories, Sidney, Ohio, comes a dainty booklet, showing in many ways How to Beautify Home Surroundings.
Landscape gardening comes in for its full share of attention, while ornamental trees and shrubs are shown in great variety. Beautiful half-tone engravings picture garden beds and walks, all rich in their appropriate garniture. Foundations of houses are banked with hardy flowers, and bay trees show to the best advantage cultivated in large tubs at the home entrance. A border bed of ornamental grasses produces a feather-like effect, while a giant clump of rudbeckia or "golden glow" out on the lawn would make the cloudiest day bright.
Wagner Park Conservatories, Sidney, Ohio.

L. Templin & Sons, Calla, O., offer lovely combinations of hardy, ever-blooming roses, also the famous new "ostrich plume" Boston fern. Their catalogue for 1904 is richly ornamented with embossed reproductions of roses and ferns, which are really works of art. This firm deals also in seeds, plants, bulbs, etc. L. Templin & Sons, Calla, O.

The Dingee & Conrad Co., West Grove, Pa.
This firm have issued a booklet devoted to floriculture and the home, which contains much of interest to flower lovers, especially rose growers.
Many lovely specimens of this queen among flowers are pictured in their varied tints in the catalogue. Dingee & Conrad Co., West Grove, Pa.

D. M. Ferry & Co., seedsmen, Detroit, Mich., are out with their lovely Seed Annual, and if the Simple branching asters with which the Annual is adorned are a fair sample of those grown from seed, every lover of this beautiful flower will do well to invest. The tall and trailing nasturtiums also show most vivid coloring and marking. D. M.
Ferry & Co., seedsmen, Detroit, Mich.

Wm. Elliott & Sons, Seeds for 1904, shows many new varieties of flowers and vegetables, and choice hardy flowering shrubs. Small fruits or nursery stock are also grown in great variety and abundance at Elliott's. The "petunia superba," pictured on the back cover, is worthy its name, both in texture and coloring. Wm. Elliott &
Sons, 44-46 Dey street, New York City.

Northrop, King & Co., seedsmen, Minneapolis, Minn., offer an exceptionally interesting list of seeds, vegetables and flowers. A feature is their sensationally early sweet corn, ten days earlier than any other variety. It is said to be sweeter than any other variety and the most productive.
No private or market garden complete without it.
Northrop, King & Co., Minneapolis, Minn.

John A. Salzer Seed Company, La Crosse, Wis., issue for 1904 an attractive calendar. Salzer's giant blue cornflower is a special attraction.
Flowers, vegetables and shrubs vie in beauty and excellence. The "Happy Thought" vegetable seed collection includes a fine variety. Oats are a specialty with Salzer. The United States Department of Agriculture at Washington says: "Mr.
Salzer, regarding your oats, in our estimation, taken as a whole, for large yield, is better than any other in the exhibit, out of a lot of 400 or 500 samples of all kinds of oats." John A. Salzer's Seed Company, La Crosse, Wis.

The Maule Seed Book for 1904 is at hand, with most attractive covers and contents. A novelty collection worth having is composed of one packet each of seeds from ten new vegetables—the shamrock cucumber, the ninety-day pepper, extra early lima bean, parsnip, onion, carrot, radish, cabbage and lettuce. The cuts, in colors, of these vegetables are most attractive. Wm. Henry Maule, Philadelphia, Pa.

Women, What Will You Give to Be Well?

Perfectly, completely well with that glad, joyous freedom and happiness in life and sweet personal lovliness which health and a well developed graceful body alone can give?
WILL YOU GIVE FIFTEEN MINUTES a day? If you will, you can be free—you can be graceful—you can be lovable and wholesome; you can have bounding, buoyant, vibrant health which will make the world look sweeter to you and you will look sweeter to the world.
There is nothing in girlhood or womanhood so lovely as a healthy, vigorous, well-kept body, sound and sweet and wholesome, full of life and strength and fire. There is nothing which gives a woman such power to win love and to wield influence.

YOU CAN BE WELL WITHOUT DRUGS

You can make yourself
Full of Life and Strength.
A Better Wife.
A Rested Mother.

It is two years this month since I began to teach women the principles of perfect health through mail instructions and my success has been marvelous. I cannot tell you how happy it makes me to realize that I have relieved over 7,000 women of all sorts of physical ailments by simply strengthening the vital organs, the nerves, heart and the lungs. I simply teach them the laws of nature. Their brains are clearer, their cheeks are rosy, their step is buoyant, they learn how to breathe and they express that buoyancy and vivacity of life which is the crown of American womanhood. Surely what I have done for you,
others I can do for you.
My work cultivates that distinguished carriage and bearing which bespeak culture and refinement.

True attractiveness is in perfect health, grace of movement, free and wholesome thoughts. These are your birthright and may be retained by simply putting yourself in harmony with Nature.

happiness, freedom of choice, I will tell you just what I feel I can do for you and I will send you an instructive booklet on how to stand correctly. Every woman should know this if she would be perfectly well. I charge you nothing for this booklet, for my information in regard to you case. Do not hesitate, write at once.
If you have not time to write me your case to-day, and really desire information in regard to my work, cut out this advertisement, giving me your name and address on the line below, and I will send it to you.

A Sweeter Sweetheart.
A More Cheerful, More Wholesome Companion.
A True, Well-Balanced Woman.

The following are extracts from three of my pupils' letters, on my desk as I write:
"I have grown from a nervous wreck into a state of good, quiet nerves."
"I have never felt so perfectly well. Just think, you have relieved me of indigestion and constipation which have bothered me for years and years.
Since you have relieved me of these troubles I have gained thirty pounds in weight and have lost the throat trouble which used to move with medicine."
"My bust has increased four inches."

A Corset Is Not Needed For a Good Figure.

I will strengthen the Stomach and Nerves so that you feel well from within, then the Liver, Kidneys and Intestines so that the impurities are thrown off from the system.
Stimulate a Sluggish Circulation and send the blood bounding through your Veins so that the Rheumatic Twinges will not appear and you will feel warm and comfortable.

Strengthen a Weak Heart of Lungs; Reduce Superfluous Flesh or Round
Out your Figure.

Relieve aching Weakness, Lame Backs and Headaches. I can do more for you than medicine can do. I can give you a Clear Brain, a Quick Perception and a New Lease of Life by simply strengthening the vital organs.
I can take but a minute to number of pupils, because I enclose a pupil my personal attention. I do not work with a woman unless I am sure I can help her. I know I can reduce prominent abdomens and hips, build up thin necks, chest and bust, and brace any woman to confidence and symmetry. I have done all of these hundreds and hundreds of times. It is no longer an experiment with me.

Write to me, telling me your particular difficulties, and I will send you letters from my pupils and give you the names of women who have been relieved of their troubles.
I charge you nothing for this booklet, for my information in regard to you case. Do not hesitate, write at once.
If you have not time to write me your case to-day, and really desire information in regard to my work, cut out this advertisement, giving me your name and address on the line below, and I will send it to you.

WHEN ROBINS BUILD

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THE snow was white awhile ago,
The winter winds were chill,
And not a leaf in verdure waved
On yonder naked hill.
To-day the grass is springing green,
The tender flowers appear,
And robins build their nests again,
'Tis love-time in the year.

We see the tokens day by day
Of our dear Father's care;
There's beauty broadcast in the land
And gladness in the air.
We need not go afar for joy:
The birds are nesting here,
And robins sing, and build their nests,
'Tis love-time in the year.

So lift we now our hymn of praise
To One whose hand divine
Is over all our earthly ways,
In shadow and in shine.
The snow is gone, the south winds blow,
The orchard blooms appear,
And robins build their nests again,
'Tis love-time in the year.

Called Higher

At the patriarchal age of ninety-two, Peter Auten, of Princeton, Ill., passed away lately. He was a man of wide Christian influence, and was one of the oldest settlers in Peoria county where he conducted a banking business for thirty years. He was always active in church work, was a warm friend of the temperance cause, and was universally beloved for his long life of good deeds.

Mrs. Clymena T. Whittier, widow of the late B. F. Rowell, died at her home in So. Solon, Jan. 26, 1904, on the place where she was born, aged eighty-four years. She had been an invalid for five years. Very early in life she gave her heart to the Saviour, becoming a member of the Christian Church at Athens, Me., and she lived a pure, devoted, conscientious Christian life. She had been a subscriber to, and a reader of, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for many years. Many were the rays of sunshine scattered by her that have brightened lonely hearts and homes.

William Henry Best passed away at Bay Centre, N. Dak., Feb. 16. He was an active Christian, and died trusting in the Lord. His neighbors loved him for his ideal Christian life and his bright, helpful nature. He was for many years a subscriber of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

The White House China

SOME of the historical china of the White House has been placed on exhibition in the hallway of the basement of the White House, and may be seen by visitors who pass through on their way to the East Room, the only room of the Executive Mansion that is open to the general public, says the Washington Star. One of the closets has been placed on the south side of the hallway in the basement and the other on the north side. The closets do not contain the full sets of the historical china of each Administration in the past, but merely specimens. The entire sets, in many cases, will be placed in glass closets in the future. The two cabinets now on exhibition contain china from the following Administrations:

The north cabinet: Upper shelf—Lincoln china, fish platter, two plates, large fruit dish, one small compote. Second shelf—Reserved for Roosevelt china. Third shelf—McKinley china, three plates, two cups and saucers, a small bonbon dish in shape national flag. Fourth shelf—Grant china, large open-work fruit dish, smaller compote, two plates, long fish platter, small butter plate.

South cabinet: Upper shelf—Hayes china (from the Theodore Davis decorated set), turkey platter, "bear and honey" salad dish, gravy boat, ice-cream plate, cup and saucer, dinner plate, plate with painting of house in which Mr. Davis made the designs for the dishes. Second shelf—Arthur china, six plates from the "gipsy set," two cups and saucers. Third shelf—Cleveland china, four plates, tea cups, gravy boat. Fourth shelf—Harrison china, cut glass, two plates, cup and saucer, ice-cream plate, goblet, finger bowl.

Mrs. Roosevelt has taken a deep interest in the exhibition of this china, and has extended her original ideas to a plan that will mean the accumulation of some of the china of each Presidential family since the government of the United States was formed. She has asked Mrs. Abby G. Baker, who has written a number of magazine articles in past years of White House china, to assist in arranging and collecting the china. All the china that has been used in the White House since the Administration of President Lincoln has been carefully preserved, but prior to that time the officials of the White House did not preserve it, and it passed into private hands.

Some of the china used by Washington when he was President, as well as a few pieces of some of the other first Presidents of the country, are on exhibition at the Smithsonian. It is probable that these will soon be transferred to the White House. There is in Massachusetts a considerable collection of the china used by the Adams family.

The government supplies each Administration with a new set of china, and when the Administration goes out it is left in the White House. Before Lincoln's time the china went to the Presidential family and did not remain in the White House.

A Strange Indian Tribe

Dr. Carl Lumholtz, the well-known traveler and explorer, tells of his experiences among the Tarahumares, a primitive people whom he discovered in the heart of Mexico. They are partial cave dwellers, strong and healthy, simple in all their ways, great runners and hunters, strangely insensible to pain or fatigue. The style of beauty most esteemed among the Tarahumares would seem peculiar to some people. Eyes like those of a mouse are considered the handsomest. The women do all the courting. When the maiden wishes to "pop the question" she throws a pebble at her beloved, and if he throws it back, the match is made.

One of the traditions among this race is that they originally descended from heaven, with corn and potatoes in their ears. Dr. Lumholtz believes that they will ultimately become consolidated with the Mexicans, to the good of the latter, "because," he says, "the Tarahumares are honest, and never cheat until they are taught better by civilization."

THE AMERICAN HOME

A 24-page family story paper, 11 x 15 inches, printed on good paper, in clear type, with an attractive cover, and containing more high-class reading matter than many publications costing from $1.00 to $3.00 a year.

Here's what The American Home offers its readers for a single dime:

4 Long Serial Stories, 8 Complete Stories, 12 Pieces of Popular Music, 48 Free Prize Contests, 60 Short Stories, 120 Articles Founded on Fact, 130 Carefully Selected Poems and 300 Short Humorous Jokes and Sketches

As an example of the high-class fiction offered the readers of The American Home, "The Substitute," by Will N. Harben, a book selling for $1.50, will be published serially beginning with the February number.

WHY WE DO IT. Of course no publication could offer so much for so little if it were not for the advertising space it sells, but in The American Home this feature is never allowed to encroach upon reading matter. Its advertising space is limited to 5,000 lines, and the value of this space depends of course upon its circulation, which at present is 211,000 copies, monthly, space selling at $1.00 per line. We want to increase the circulation to 1,000,000 so that advertisers will be glad to pay us $4.00 per line, and to this end we offer to the persons sending us the best suggestion for gaining new subscriptions. The FIRST PRIZE is $500. The other $500 will be divided into small amounts from $200 down to $1.00. Full information in regard to this contest will be found in The American Home which will be mailed to you for one year for 10 Cents, stamps or coin.

AS THE largest real estate firm in the world we are undertaking the most important step in our history, and one which means the material prosperity of many people throughout the United States. We would therefore ask the careful attention of every man and woman who reads THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to see if this step does not contain an opportunity for you infinitely broader than any which is afforded in your own community.

Last year we sold more than $4,000,000 worth of New York City lots throughout the United States and the rest of the civilized world. We own and control more Brooklyn house lots than any firm or corporation in New York City, and we now propose to push our enterprises with the greatest energy everywhere. We intend to make our name and our reputation a household word throughout the country, and we desire a representative in every town and city in the United States.

If you are a man of character and energy, we have a plan by which you can partake of our prosperity and receive the direct benefits of our extensive advertising in building up a business

In Your Own Immediate Territory

We desire only representative men. Men who are successful in the work they are now undertaking. Men who can give the best of references. We do not want failures. We believe the man who is a good business man in a small community needs only the opportunity to make relatively greater success where his field is broader. Many of the best successes of the great cities are those men who have made successes in the small towns, and we propose to bring the opportunity of the great city right to your own door. Last year three of our salesmen averaged over $11,000 apiece by their own unaided efforts, and two of them while working in small cities. We have many salesmen making $3,000 to $5,000 a year, and in nearly every instance they are men who are either conducting their own business in connection with our work or, because ours was so much more profitable and attractive, have given up their other occupations entirely. If you are energetic, if your reputation is clean, there is no reason, as Mr. Inge says, why you cannot do as well as he. We desire to select our general agents from those who manifest ability, and eventually to give exclusive territory to men who are competent to manage and develop it.

The Opportunity is Practically Unlimited in its Possibilities

New York is rapidly becoming the financial center of the world, as well as the center of the largest population. Her real estate constitutes the most conservative of investments, and is owned and being sought for over the wide world. When combined with life insurance and offered in the attractive form in which we place it before the public, our New York City house lots form an investment of most interest and attractiveness. We intend to give all who apply this year the opportunity of securing territory in which we will protect them and in which they can grow with us and share in the magnitude of our future business. We do not care to be bothered with triflers, but to those who are thoroughly in earnest we will give every assistance to establish themselves permanently and partake of the great future our business is destined to enjoy. RUSSELL SAGE, one of the world's greatest Investors and Financiers, recently said, in an interview in the New York World:

"A man who buys real estate in any of the five boroughs—of course exercising average good judgment—has a fortune before him. BROOKLYN is growing at the rate of 75,000 people a year."

Z. M. P. INGE, Our Mobile Agent

MOBILE, ALA., September 1st, 1901

To whom it may concern:

This is to certify that fourteen months ago I accepted a position as Mobile agent for Wood, Harmon & Company's New York properties in connection with an active law practice. I did so after an investigation extending over six months, convincing myself of the absolute responsibility of the firm and the remarkable character of their properties. My commissions in the past year have amounted to $16,561, and this amount of money has been obtained without in the least neglecting a general law practice and other professional work with which I am connected.

While it is possible that all persons who attempt to sell for Wood, Harmon & Company might not succeed, yet I can conceive how any man who will thoroughly acquaint himself with the facts, and put earnest and intelligent effort into his work, can fail to do handsomely for himself, nor can I see why there are not hundreds who are sufficiently well equipped to do at least as well as I. My faith in Wood, Harmon & Company and their properties may have been an important factor in my success, but it is the sale of New York real estate has been the easiest kind of work for me.

Yours very truly, Z. M. P. INGE

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

SPECIAL NOTICE

All letters for the "Mail-Bag" must contain the name and address of the writer, not for publication, but so that an answer may be sent by mail if necessary.

Reader, Macon, Mo. I have prayed for ten years to overcome a besetting sin. God has just heard and answered my prayer because of "my importunity." I write this because I read in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a question to overcome a besetting sin, when, after repeated trials to overcome the sin, the sin overcame me.

Thousands have had a similar experience. After a futile struggle to conquer the sin, in their own strength, they have importunately prayed for relief. When their own efforts have ceased, then the wonder has taken place, and the answer has come to their petitions.

Student, Baltimore, Md. 1. Assuming the partial solidity of the earth, what is its approximate weight? 2. What is the most reasonable conjecture as to the nature of the earth's interior?

1. Astronomers estimate the weight of the globe at 6,000,000,000,000,000,000,000,000 tons. 2. Concerning the earth's interior, the American Inventor sums up the latest scientific conclusions thus: "The earth's temperature varies greatly at different depths, the average increase being one degree for every sixty feet below the surface. If this increase is maintained, the excavator would soon reach the boiling point. The opinion that we were living upon a thin crust, over a molten mass, for which volcanoes are safety valves, has been disproved. An earthquake in Japan is able to register itself in England, on the opposite side of the globe. This actually happened in the case of the disaster in North Japan, four or five years ago, when 30,000 people lost their lives. A tremor of this kind could not pass unless the earth had a rigidity approaching that of steel, and observations of tides and the attractions exercised upon us by sun and moon have made it pretty certain that our world is just about as hard and solid as so much steel. This makes it fairly certain that the earth is solid all through, with perhaps occasional accumulations of fluid rock here and there in parts. It also destroys the old theory of volcanoes."

How I Worked My Way Around the World is a unique production. I do not know that I ever read a book that interested me so much as this, and I regretted when I reached the last page. The various places visited by the author are so elaborately described as to render the work extremely valuable.

JOHN SIDONS.

P. A., Harman, W. Va. Is it true that the Shakespearean audiences were composed of men only when the plays were first given?

The players were men, but there may have been and doubtless there were, women in the audiences.

E. P. M., Westville, Conn. 1. "I came not to call the righteous, but the sinners to repentance." Mark 2: 17, and Luke 5: 32. Does that mean that there are some righteous? 2. "There is more joy over one sinner that repenteth than over ninety and nine just persons that need no repentance." Does that mean some need no repentance?

1. Not necessarily. It was as though he had said, "Ye deem yourselves whole; therefore my mission is not to you. Ye believe yourselves righteous; therefore you cannot feel a personal interest in this call." It was their own self-righteousness that was their stumbling-block. 2. No, it means that the repentance of the sinner who has been living in open and flagrant wickedness gives such occasion for rejoicing as can never be experienced in the case of those who have grown up from childhood in the fear of God and who are the "sheep of his pasture."

H. C. C., Darby, Conn. Can you tell me why the Powers allow Turkey to massacre the Armenians, or Macedonians? Two hundred and seven Christian villages destroyed by the Turks.

Turkey is a despotism, like Russia, and for centuries it has kept these people in cruel and tyrannical subjection. Whenever there is a sign of revolt, the Turks rise and massacre a number of their victims as a warning to others. It is the shame of Europe that such things should be tolerated, but Turkey's clever diplomacy and her position in European politics, have secured her the support of so-called "Christian" Powers, that should have driven the Moslems out of Europe long ago.

J. B., Folsom, S. Dak. What authority have we for celebrating the resurrection on Easter Sunday? Why is it not a fixed date?

The evangelists concur in assigning the Crucifixion to the week of the Passover, God's power and mercy may be exercised toward the Gentiles, too. 2. The passage is part of the argument by which he would reprove men for criticizing God's government. Paul doubtless had no idea of the use to which this step in his argument would be put; for of all Bible writers, he is most emphatic in holding men responsible for their rejection of the offer of salvation. 3. Luther did not reject the epistle, though he disliked it. He spoke of it contemptuously as "a right strawy epistle." It so happened that in his day there was need to insist on salvation by faith, as it is in our day to insist that conduct shall be in harmony with, and an expression of, faith.

Edna C., Colebrook, Ont., Can. What is the Monroe Doctrine? I have often read about it, but do not know what it means.

It is a political policy first promulgated during the administration of the presidency of Monroe, in 1823. The message which embodies the vital spirit of the doctrine refers to the proposed intervention of the allied Powers (France, Russia, Prussia and Austria), for the purpose of reducing the revolting Spanish colonies in America, whose indepenthing and to acquire property which rightfully belongs to others, who really inherit the earth, but the quiet, contented man, who has worldly objects in small esteem. It was, we understand it, a reproof to the grasping, restless, covetous spirit.

Miss Alice S. What is the origin of phonetic spelling?

Phonetic spelling is a system in which words are spelled exactly as they are pronounced. The sounds are represented by characters, each representing a single sound. Phonetic printing was first suggested by Isaac Pitman, of Bath, England, and reduced to a system by him, in 1843-1846. Since that time many schemes of phonetic spelling have been proposed, and several are now in daily use by stenographers in the United States.

W. B., St. Louis, Mo. What is the number of native Christians in the Japanese Empire? of the missionaries working there?

About ten years ago, there were over 25,000 native converts in Japan. There were 1,000 schools with 22,000 pupils; since that time various disturbances have arisen which interfered seriously with the work, but now it is going on with renewed vigor, and many natives are embracing Christianity. The number of converts has greatly increased. Nearly every evangelical church is represented there.

Mrs. G. B., Reddick.

1. Can you tell where in the Bible can find the passage telling about the being cast out of heaven? 2. What is the proper pronunciation of "Eunice"?

See Luke 10: 42.

Isaiah 14: 12, II. Peter 2: 4 and Jude 6. 2. pronounced "u-nees."

J. D., Pearl River, N. Y. Is coat-of-mail worn anywhere in battle nowadays, as it used to be in olden times?

We doubt it. There may be some few nations—Moors, Chinese, Tartars, Afghans, and the like—who still cling to the ancient idea.

though not extensively. It was stated lately in a Vienna dispatch that all the Japanese generals and admirals wear coat-of-mail tunics under their uniform, and that it is absolutely bullet-proof.

Mrs. A. B. H. Pronounce all the letters written except "c," which is silent.

Vesta, Dayton, O. There are at the present time between 3,500 and 3,700 central electric stations in the United States, the construction of which cost $504,740,352. Illinois has the greatest number under private ownership; Ohio the largest number under municipal control.

J. K., Grove, Kan. The person who has been slandered should not show resentment. You must remember that the slanderer really does the greatest injury to himself. He has injured his own reputation by the lie; and on reflection, he will very likely feel this to be true.

Fred T., Baltic, Mich. 1. You can go before court in your own district and be naturally. Your "second paper" will be granted five years after the first. The court will explain all the requirements. 2. You can obtain the Hall of Fame on sending $1 to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office.

Among the Workers

—IN THE remarkable series of revival services at Moulton, Ia., lately, nearly 250 confessed Christ. The evangelists were Henry W. Stough and L. P. Conner.

—E. A. VAIL, Superintendent of the New Gospel Mission, 1,811 Magnolia street, New Orleans, reports that his mission work is struggling under severe burdens. Any help would be appreciated.

—LOUP CITY, NEB., has just closed a remarkable revival, the greatest in its history. More than fifty confessed conversion. The work has been thorough. The pastor was ably assisted by G. A. Jones, an evangelist of York, Neb.

"THE KINGDOM OF PEACE," FROM THE FAMOUS DESIGN BY GEORGE TINWORTH

This terra cotta panel, representing the chief work of George Tinworth, was made in England, and was originally intended for the St. Louis Exposition, but was withdrawn at the last moment, on account of the danger of injury in transit, owing to its great size and weight. Describing the panel, Black and White says: "The artist has taken for his principal text, the passage in Isaiah 11: 5-9, which describes Christ's Kingdom in the last days. Despite the multiplicity of figures in this huge panel, the design is nowhere confused, and the varied importance of the principal characters is admirably regulated; while the modeling is good and the whole panel highly finished."

though there is some difficulty in harmonizing John's account with those of the other three. A careful study of the four accounts, leads to the belief that it took place on the day before the Jewish Sabbath. There is no doubt that all agree about the resurrection having taken place on the first day of the week, following the celebration of the Passover. The question to determine, therefore, was the date of the Passover. That was regulated by the moon. It was to be held at the first full moon which occurred after the equinox—March 21. This custom was followed with our Easter celebration, which accords with the ecclesiastical instead of the calendar year.

W. N. M., Stoneham, Mass. 1. Who are the elect mentioned in Rom. 8: 33? 2. What does Rom. 9: 18-24, which speaks of the potter and the clay mean? 3. Did Luther reject the epistle of James?

1. The word means chosen. The Apostle's argument runs through the whole epistle, and not until we reach the close of the eleventh chapter do we discover his aim, which is to show that God would "have mercy upon all." (See Rom. 11: 32). He is not dealing with the doctrines which now agitate the church, but with the admission of the Gentiles, and is answering the questions prominent in the philosophy of his time. The Jew gloried in his election, and the Apostle is showing that dence had already been recognized by the United States. President Monroe's message stated that "we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety." It added, further, that "the American continents, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintained, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European powers." This doctrine has been firmly maintained ever since.

Subscriber. Is it right for a professing Christian to drink moderately, say three or four drinks a day? Would you call it hypocrisy, to drink it at home, concealed from the world?

We should be disposed to call such a person a tippler, who is in a fair way to become a drunkard ere long. It is impossible to reconcile such habits with the profession of Christianity.

C. C. H., Webster Grove, Mo. When and under what circumstances will our Lord's promise be fulfilled (Matt. 5: 5) that the meek shall inherit the earth?

It belongs to the same class of sayings as that "He that loseth his life shall save it." Christ's meaning appears to be that it is not the ambitious, the contentious men, the men who are continually striving to gain every-

AN ILLUSTRATED FAMILY MAGAZINE

A Great Pilgrimage to Palestine

WE are going to be for a little while where Christ lived; we are going to stand where he stood, and in his own land be inspired anew to carry on his work at home, when we return," said one of the pilgrims, Jerusalem bound, just before the sailing of the big liner Grosser Kurfuerst, carrying 800 delegates to attend the fourth World's Sunday School Convention.

Every State in the Union was represented among the pilgrims, and there were a number of delegates from Canada and Mexico. As the hour for sailing drew near, on the afternoon of March 8, the big steamer was fully packed with happy humanity. There were missionaries grown gray in the service, who were going back to their work after a brief rest in the home-land; but the greater part of the delegation were new to travel—ocean travel at least—and the joys of new sensations were to be theirs from the time the steamer left the crowded pier. There were white-robed dominies, who tried to appear as if a journey of 12,000 miles was a mere bagatelle to them; young ministers, some with their wives, and some who looked helplessly without. There were Sunday School teachers, and a large percentage of scholars, who seemed to think this was the finest picnic they had ever been their privilege to attend. Everyone seemed happy, with few exceptions. One man pronounced in sepulchral tones that there were four in his stateroom, and that it was not a very big one either.

Ohio sent the largest delegation—eighty persons. These delegates all wore badges, with the name of the State on one bar, Jerusalem on another, and a cross and crown in the centre. The leader of the Ohioans was Dr. Joseph Clark, of Columbus.

F. H. Jacobs, the "Singing Evangelist," will lead the musical services during the tour. Mr. Jacobs is formerly with Evangelist D. Moody, and is now Superintendent of the Fulton Street Prayer Meeting.

Among the many pleasant features of the voyage which have been planned by the management, will be the various meetings, religious and musical, on deck and below. A practical plan to enlighten the pilgrims as to the places to which they are going, is a course of stereopticon lectures, describing the different localities.

A daily paper is to be published during the voyage, and various entertainment clubs have promised that time shall not hang heavily upon the travelers' hands.

Madeira will be the first stop, where a day and a-half will be spent in sightseeing. Then at Gibraltar, the fortifications, and parks will be inspected, with the help of guides. In Algiers, a carriage drive of half a day. Landing at Malta, thirty miles of railway to Citta Vecchia and return. Reaching Piræus, the party will go to Athens by rail.

Service will be held on Mars' Hill on Sunday morning. Three days will be spent in Constantinople, and on landing at Smyrna, guides will be furnished for sightseeing and there will be a side-trip to Ephesus. From Smyrna, which is the next landing, there will be side-trips to Damascus and Baalbec. Next, Khafa, landing parties for side-trips or of those wishing to stay over on the return of the steamer. At last the pilgrims arrive in Jerusalem, where they will visit the pools of Solomon, Rachel's Tomb, Bethlehem, and Bethlehem Hills, Mount of Olives, Bethany and Gethsemane. There will be a half-day's ride around the Walls of Jerusalem, on donkeys. All the leading points of interest will be visited, including Calvary and the Tomb.

One of the most important features of the Convention will be the presence of foreign missionaries from Europe, Asia and Africa, who will join the tourists in the Mediterranean. These men and women, with an intimate knowledge of foreign conditions and sympathy with those in less enlightened lands, can present the uplifting power of the Gospel as applied to millions.

The Sunday School Convention will last three days—April 18, 19 and 20—and will be held in two large tents, pitched near Calvary, outside the city, near Damascus Gate. All the regular tours for exploration and sightseeing, have been planned in such a way as to take in every point of interest in and about Jerusalem.

At Alexandria, there will be a carriage drive, and rebuild it, but Julius Severus captured the city, and now a Mohammedan mosque has been erected on its site. After many vicissitudes under Mohammedan-Turkish rule, Jerusalem is today the residence of the Pasha of Palestine. A fragment of a column near the Garden of Gethsemane indicates the place where tradition says Judas betrayed the Master with a kiss. There are several very ancient olive trees in the Garden; some are even said to date from Christ's time. This tour will mean much more to the delegates than any ordinary excursion: there will be an added interest in all Bible-reading after visiting these different localities, so closely associated with the Saviour's birth, life and death. It will all seem more real, after having stood where his feet once trod, and gazed upon the self-same scenes upon which he gazed with such sorrowful eyes, so many centuries ago.

One of the delegates was heard to say, just before the steamer sailed: "Perhaps we may carry something of Christianity back to where it had its origin. The Gospel came from Jerusalem. We will try and show Jerusalem what it has done for the rest of the world. The missionaries in the field will come to our gatherings in and about Jerusalem, and gain new strength from the evidence that we at home are working, too."

There is an increasing desire on the part of all students of the Bible to come into possession of a substantial historic basis for their faith.

"Back to Christ" has meant various things to various types of minds, but the most real and practical interpretation of this rallying cry is surely found in the impulse, stronger to-day than ever before, to realize the actual life and words of the Son of God, as he walked and talked with men.

To this end, nothing can be more conducive than a familiar knowledge of the scenes of his earthly labors. The material evidence for the truth of one's spiritual faith will certainly strengthen the hold of that faith. There will be many recreative and sightseeing features connected with this World's Sunday School Convention, but it will result in a most important evangelical work.

While visiting the scenes of Biblical history in Palestine and Egypt, and the old cities of Southern Europe, where the great cathedrals and art galleries bear witness to the indelible impress of the Christian faith upon the thought and action of men, cannot but vivify and increase the Christian's belief in his religion.

There are many guide-books which give minute descriptions of these localities, but the best of all is the Bible. One of the optional side-trips is especially worthy of mention, and that is the visit to the ancient city of Damascus. One can travel in comfort by the new French railway from Beyrout to Damascus.

This line, in the short distance from Beyrout up the Lebanon, some 4,900 feet at its highest point, descending again on the eastern slopes, and after crossing the beautiful plain of the Bakaa, passes through the antelebanon, by the valleys of the Yahfah and Abana, following the river from the watershed to Damascus, the oldest city in the world. On account of its beautiful and fertile surroundings, its lofty position, and its inexhaustible springs of fresh water, it has been called the "Pearl of the Orient." Here is pointed out the site where Naaman's house stood, and that of Ananias, on the street called "Straight," and the traditional spot where Paul was let down from the wall in a basket.

another at Cairo, a visit to the Pyramids and Heliopolis. A little more than five days will be spent in Egypt. The visit to Naples comes next, where train will be taken to Pompeii. Then to Rome by rail and return, where four days will be spent sightseeing. Then a coaching trip to Nice. There are also numerous and interesting side trips to be taken, if one cares to incur the extra expense.

The centre of interest for the Convention will be the city of Jerusalem. Very little of the ancient city of the Jewish Empire is left; still, by investigation, one can readily picture in imagination much of the Jerusalem of old. Solomon's beautiful Temple was destroyed in 70 A.D. Fifty years later the Jews attempted to

Rev. Frank De Witt Calmage, D.D.

The Good Soldier

TEXT—II. Tim. 2: 3:

"Endure hardness, as a good soldier of Jesus Christ"

WHAT is war? "War is hell," once bluntly said William T. Sherman. War is a river of blood flowing into a river of blood. War means sickness and death, widowhood and orphanhood, mangled bodies, devastated harvest fields, and pauperism. War is a mortal grapple when nation says to nation, "My quarrel with you cannot be settled but by fighting, and now we will see which of us two has the power to crush the other," and then they put their armies in the field commissioned to kill one another. War is a grave trench, dug with bayonets. It is the heavens deluging countless tears. It is man with clenched fist and flaming eye—man with an artillery wagon for a carriage, and with the surgeon's operating table for a couch. War! It is the most brutal, the most fiendish, the most terrific, the most blasting curse of the ages. We have the right to hate it with an intense hatred, and to pray that the Prince of Peace may give us more antipathy to it, and a more intense horror of the awful misery, suffering and death that it entails.

A Soldier-Bishop

But though war is an awful international curse, there have been occasions when men have entered the army and have gone to the battlefield from conscientious motives. There have been cases, as every student of history knows, when it has become a sacred duty, for the redress of wrong, or for the defence of the home, for the patriotic citizen to take up arms. Christ himself recognized the fact, when he said, "I came not to send peace on the earth, but a sword." So it has come to pass that his followers have at times, with sore reluctance, but under a stern sense of duty, engaged in war. Unhappily, too, they have been found in hostile camps, as in our own Civil War, when good Christian men conscientiously followed the Confederate flag, as others equally conscientiously followed the Union flag. A conspicuous illustration was that of Leonidas Polk, the Bishop of Louisiana, whose pure Christian character none could deny. He was so gentle and kind in his private life, that when one of his black slaves was dying, he was just as tender to him as if the black man had been his own flesh and blood. On the night on which the humble slave closed his eyes in death, the good Bishop said, "Tom, is there anything else I can do for you?" The answer was, "Yes, massa. If you will only lie down by me on the bed, and put your arm around my neck, and let me put my arm around your neck, as we used to do when boys lying under the green walnut trees, I think that I could die more easy." So the great Southern minister and leader lay down upon his slave's cot, and held his black servant in his white arms, until the white angel of death came down and took the soul from beneath the black skin. Surely such a man of God as Bishop Polk was not cruel or malevolent. Yet at the bugle blast of war, he donned the soldier's uniform. As a Lieutenant-General of the Confederate Army, he was shot at Pine Mountain, Ga., June 14, 1864. He was shot only a few hours after he had conformed into the Episcopal Church some of his brother officers.

Christian Heroism

It is proper and right, at certain times and seasons, for good men to go to war, if they go with the right motive. The qualities which go to make up a good and a brave soldier are those which should characterize a good Christian. The courage and self-sacrifice and devotion to a righteous cause, which have been displayed in the field are needed in the Christian's daily life. Therefore, Paul aptly and powerfully uses the figure of my text for a gospel comparison. He is practically saying to young Timothy, "Look upon your Christ as a great leader and general. Enlist in his service. Implicitly obey his orders. Charge, in Christ's name, if the order is given you to charge. Do sentinel duty and trudge weary marches, if that is your order. Be ready to fight on battlefield, or starve in trench, or suffer in hospital, as duty may command." All young people are delighted with a military parade. Let me, in this sermon, recount for you how a Gospel soldier should obey Christ's bugle call.

What does it mean to be a Gospel soldier? First and foremost, to take the oath of enlistment. The difference between an army and a mob, the difference between a collection of men governed by one brain, ruled by one voice, directed by one order, and a lot of men running hither and thither like a flock of sheep, or frightened, stampeding cattle, doing as they will, is the difference between the oath of enlistment and no oath. Before a man takes the oath of enlistment, he is a free man. After he takes the oath of enlistment, he is no longer an independent individuality. The oath of enlistment practically says: "I will, if necessary, let others do my thinking. I will go where I am told to go, and do what I am told to do." The oath of enlistment is more binding than bands of steel. I well remember the time that I took the oath of enlistment in the United States army, and the transformation in my life, which immediately took place on account of that oath. The Spanish-American War had broken out. At that time, I was living in Chicago, and was chaplain of one of the largest regiments in Illinois. As soon as war was declared, the colonel telegraphed Governor Tanner, placing our whole regiment at the service of the State. What to do I knew not. My duty to my church and to my family required me to stay; my duty to my country called me to go.

Worried and fretted by these conflicting duties, I was harrowed by day, and could not sleep by night. But no sooner did I enter the Exposition Grounds at Springfield, Ill., where we encamped; no sooner did the mustering officer tell me to raise my right hand over the open Bible, and take the oath of enlistment, than all worry, and doubt, and trouble, faded from my mind. Why? One minute before I took that oath of enlistment I was free to do as I would. One minute after I took that oath of enlistment I was a United States soldier, subject to the orders of the President of the United States.

Waiting Christ's Orders

What is true in reference to the English soldier, or the French soldier, or the American soldier, is true of the Gospel soldier. You cannot do effective service as a soldier of Jesus Christ, unless you publicly give to him your oath of enlistment. And when you once do give that oath, then you are no longer your own master. Then you are in exactly the same position toward your Divine Commander as was Captain Clark towards his earthly commander. After he had brought the Oregon on her famous trip from the Pacific Ocean around South America's southernmost cape, up past the coast of Brazil, Captain Clark immediately went into the first United States port he could find, and telegraphed President McKinley: "The Oregon has arrived safe, and is awaiting orders." So, when you become a Christian soldier, or a Christian sailor, you must first take your oath of enlistment, and then always be "waiting orders." In the public church aisle, and by the table of the Holy Communion, you give open testimony of your purpose to surrender your will to the divine will. You must say, "I am ready, oh Christ, to do what thou wilt have me to do, and go where thou commandest me to go."

What does it mean to be a Gospel soldier? To be assigned to some distinct part of some distinct command in the great Christian army, following the standards of Christ Jesus. To have an individual place reserved for you in the Gospel ranks, where you are to fight for the Church militant, as each private American soldier during the Civil War had a place reserved for him in the ranks, whether he belonged to the cavalry, or the artillery, the infantry, or the engineering corps. As a military organization is a great aggregation of individuals, so the success of the army depends upon that military organization being divided, and subdivided, and divided again, by orderly arrangement. The individual, the private soldier, must have his distinct place, just as the general, or the colonel, or the major, or the captain, has his place.

Individual Responsibility

Let us study for a moment the construction of an American army. Take, for illustration, that which followed Sherman to the sea. There were in that host about one hundred thousand men. These one hundred thousand men were divided first into three parts, each commanded by a major-general. Generals Schofield, McPherson, and Slocum had respectively charge of the right wing, the centre, and the left wing of that army. Then each wing and centre were again divided into corps, under such leaders as Generals Logan, Howard, and Kirkpatrick. Then these corps were again subdivided into divisions, and these divisions again into brigades, and these brigades into regiments, and these regiments into companies, and each private soldier was assigned to a distinct company, the letter of which was marked on his hat, and the number of the regiment marked upon the lapel of his coat. Each American soldier always had a distinct place reserved for him in the ranks where he was supposed to fight. Sometimes in battle, an American soldier might get separated from his company. During the two days' fighting before Santiago, an American lieutenant saw a colored trooper of the Tenth Cavalry fighting by the side of his white men. When the lieutenant asked the black man why he was there, he replied, "I have lost my command, and so, sir, if you will, I would like to fight in your company." The permission was given. That night, when the colored soldier was about to hunt up his command, he asked the lieutenant to give him a note to his captain, to prove that he had been in battle and not been skulking in the rear. The next day, when going over the field hunting for his dead and wounded, this same lieutenant found upon the bloody field the same colored trooper, mortally wounded. The colored soldier beckoned to the lieutenant to lean over him. Then the dying man whispered, "Take that note and give it to the Captain of L Troop, Tenth Cavalry, Lawton's division, and tell him that I tried to report to my company, but could not find him. Give him the paper and say that Williams was not a coward." Yes! 'tis true! A United States soldier always has an individual place reserved for him in the ranks, where he is expected to be and expected to fight.

Difficult Positions

The United States soldier must be able to answer a roll-call in a certain company, of a certain regiment, of a certain brigade, of a certain division, of a certain corps. So the Gospel soldier should have a distinct place in which he has his name upon the muster roll of the church militant. There should be no "free lance" in the Gospel army—no guerrilla bands. Guerrilla ranks are filled up for the most part with iconoclasts and anarchists and cutthroats. But the Gospel soldier must be a regularly enlisted man, detailed for work to some one Bible class, to some one Sunday School, to some one prayer-meeting, to some one church. A Gospel soldier is a Christian who obeys orders. How can he obey Christ's orders unless you have taken your individual place in the Gospel ranks of Christ's great army, called the Church?

The true Gospel soldier always considers the possibility of danger the posts of honor. He wants to hear the singing of the shells, even though that martial song may have to be accompanied by his own death rattle. He wants to be as most of the soldiers were after they had enlisted for the Spanish-American War. Oh, how anxious the officers and privates alike longed for the front! They wanted to have a glorious part in the liberation of down-trodden Cuba. Some men had to go for that liberation. Then the brave fellows of the different regiments, by telegram upon telegram, sent to the governors and to the officials at Washington, practically said: "We are ready to go to the front; any sacrifice our lives, if need be, in our country's service." So eager were those soldiers for dangers and service, that when some of their colonels received telegrams that switched them from the transport to Tampa, to Jacksonville, Florida, there was sorrow and disappointment in many hearts.

Holding the Fort

Posts of danger and difficulty are always posts of honor in the United States army. And yet, to hear some Christian soldiers talk, you would suppose that the posts in Christ's army, where there are difficulties, are the posts to be avoided or deserted. Even some of the ordained ministers of Jesus Christ feel that way. "Oh," says a visiting clergyman, "I am so discouraged. Why there has been nothing but friction and trouble in my church ever since I came to it. The people here fought and misrepresented every minister who ever occupied this pulpit, and they have been finding fault with and misrepresenting me. I am so discouraged I wish God would find me another place." Well, my brother, I confess you are having a hard time of it. I confess that some churches have a bad record. I know of one church that for forty years has made its chief fault in breaking down its different ministers. One pastor after another has been destroyed in regular order as he came to its parsonage. One minister was so tantalized and attacked that, under the persecution of the members, he committed suicide. But tell me, you who have been having a hard time in that church, do you not think you are getting along there as well as anyone else could? "Oh, yes," you answer, "I know I am. In spite of the balking elders and two obstinate, fault-finding trustees, we are taking in new members all the time. Nevertheless the church's history has it been doing so much good. Then, my brother, instead of complaining about your lot, you should be congratulated. Go ahead and do your work. God has honored you above all others. He has put you in a difficult position. Post of difficulty is always post of honor.

Sunday School teacher, that is a tough class of boys you have. You came to me the other day, with tears in your eyes. Some people may think I am talking about an imaginary case, but you know I am not. The at times pester you so much, that you have half made up your mind to give up the class. Do not do it. These boys may stick pins into each other. They may come to class with dirty faces. They may seem to be ungrateful. But remember, oh, Christian soldier, if you desert your post now and leave those boys, they will not only be the voice of another teacher. They will not come to church at all. You must be to those boys what Dr. T. Barnardo is to the London newsboy, and Charles Crittenton is to the Florence Crittenton Missions, and what Livingstone was to Africa, and Carey was to India. The Gospel heroes of the past have given up their all to win their victories. They labored, they suffered, they sacrificed themselves among the outcasts. "Be thou and do likewise."

But there is another great fact which the good soldier of Jesus Christ should realize. The duties of the camp rightly performed, are sometimes just as essential for the work, as duties rightly performed at the front. The work which is done by the commissary and the surgeon have sometimes a greater part to play in winning martial victories, than the spectacular color-sergeant has in leading the charge before the enemy's bastions. What defeated Napoleon Bonaparte in his famous Russian invasion? The bayonets of the mighty Czar? No! The conqueror of Germany and Austria and Italy could have brushed those guns aside and had done in former campaigns. It was the haversack empty of bread, which made the "Little Corsican" run like a frightened hare towards home. It was Moscow in flames, and his men with nothing to eat, that made the French commander tremble before the stony silence of death. And yet, to read some military biographies, you might suppose the personal worth of a Grant, a Sherman, a Meade, a Hancock, were the cause of all the victories achieved by the Northern armies in the Civil War. And the mental powers of a Lee, a Longstreet, a Jackson, a Gordon, a Johnson, were the cause of all the victories of the Southern armies.

The unrecognized heroes of the Civil War have not done their due. The generals and the boys who fought at the front have been honored as they deserved, but who has had a tribute of praise to give to the self-sacrificing men who made it possible for the fighting soldiers to live and die at the front. I would sing the praises of the muleteers. I would sing the praises of the army officers who bought the shoes and the stockings, and the trousers and the coats, and the hats, and the blankets, and forwarded them, and never let a dishonest dollar stick to their fingers. I would sing the praises of the ambulance corps, and of the soldiers who acted as nurses. Did you ever stop to think, that in all the United States, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, there is not one, not even one monument, erected to an army surgeon? Many memorial stones for McPherson and Sherman. A magnificent remembrance to Grant, but not one monument for one surgeon. In all the United States, not one monument erected to a mustering officer who stayed at home to fill up the ranks. Not one.

Christian soldiers, who are the stay-at-homes! I have recounted these deeds of the unrecognized heroes of war for a purpose. I want to encourage you in your ordinary duties of life. It is not possible for every Christian to be a Chinese Gordon, or a Havelock, or a O. O. Howard, or a Stonewall Jackson? It is not possible for all Christian soldiers to stand in the conspicuous places and win the plaudits of the Christian world? But remember that the humble private in Christ's army—she who as a mother living in the home, as a sister working behind the counter, as a daughter teaching school to support an aged parent or to give an education to a young brother, is in God's sight one of the essentials for his great army. Paul is saying to the soldier in the rear as well as at the front, to the inconspicuous as well as the conspicuous soldier alike, "endure hardness, as a good soldier of Jesus Christ."

And why should we all endure hardness, as good soldiers of Jesus Christ? For two reasons. First, because it is possible for every private as well as Christian officer to receive the highest of all soldier's rewards. What is the highest? Yea, the very highest? We have read how the Duke of Marlborough was honored, not only was he created a Duke, but on account of the Blenheim victory, Parliament voted him the magnificent manor of Woodstock, and his Royal Mistress gave him $1,000,000. We have read how Arthur Wellesley was raised to be Duke of Wellington on account of his victory at Waterloo. Lord Roberts, recently the commander of the British forces, and Viscount Kitchener, were raised to the peerage for their services rendered to the British crown. But all these offerings and honors, these dignities and fame, given by a grateful country to faithful sons, will be as nothing compared to the greatest gift which is given to a Christian soldier. The gift which is the smile of approbation from a loving Divine Commander. The "Well done!" which goes to the Christian hero by the name of Adoniram Judson. The "Well done!" which is given to the humble servant girl, and to the humble clerk, and to the humble nurse, and to the humble missionary.

But why, again, should we all endure hardness, as good soldiers of Jesus Christ? Because in so doing we are following his blessed example. He who spared not himself but suffered freely for us, has the right to expect fortitude from us. From none of us does he ask such service as he himself rendered to us. When the army of Alexander the Great was scaling a noted mountain-pass, the strength of the soldiers became exhausted. Many threw themselves upon the ground to die. The great commander saw the condition. He did not curse or upbraid. He quietly dismounted from his war charger. He threw aside his heavy cloak. He lifted a private soldier's pick-axe, then vigorously went to work, digging away at the ice. His soldiers saw him. They knew he was as tired as they. Then they jumped to their feet. By the power of a brave example they arose and went again to work, and again won a new victory. Christian soldiers, wherever we go, we can find our Divine Leader ahead. Our backs may ache, but he is carrying our burden of sin. Our feet may grow tired, but from his feet and hands and head and heart are flowing streams of blood. So over Christ's body we may win Eternal life. And here and now upon the foundation stones of a Christ's mausoleum, may we build the great "White Temple of a Christian soldier's sacrifice."

THE MORMON SHAME

THE scope of the Reed Smoot inquiry by Congress widens, it discloses a problem that is far broader and more important than that of the granting or refusing a seat to a Senator-elect. It is no longer Smoot alone who is on trial, but the whole Mormon hierarchy; and the question has come squarely home to the American people, whether the time has not arrived for the enactment of new legislation, which shall forever stamp out not only the whole Mormon system, but its abominable sequel of polygamous habitation, which is now illegally tolerated in Utah. It has been demonstrated that existing laws are not adequate to deal with this evil, which flourishes in spite of statutes that were enacted for its suppression.

In the mass of evidence presented before the Senate Committee, there are two distinct things to be noted: first, that which bears directly on the case of Smoot, and second, that which relates to the admitted criminal violation of the laws by practically the entire body of the Mormon leadership, from the president down. As to the first, while it has not been proved that Senator Smoot is a polygamist, it is demonstrated to the satisfaction of the investigators, that he is the political representative of the Mormon Church in the Senate, and not of the people of Utah; that he was compelled to obtain the consent of President Smith and the Apostolate to his candidature; that he is in the most literal sense the candidate of the Mormon hierarchy, and bound so strongly to the church that it is inconceivable how he can be at liberty to act freely and independently on any measure involving the interests of the State. It has been shown that no person the Mormon Church dares aspire to a political position, unless to be approved by the church and without binding himself to serve its interests. He is obligated, first and last, to obey the political wishes of the Apostolate. This being the case, no Mormon in Congress can be said to be, even in a remote sense, the free and untrammelled representative of Utah. He is simply the political tool of the church, to which he has sworn a life-and-death allegiance. Were Smoot a free man, his claim to a seat could not be successfully challenged. If the Senate Committee takes the view that he is not free, but is bound to the Mormon hierarchy, and was chosen and elected by its influence, it is difficult to see how it can avoid the conclusion that his seat should be declared vacant.

As to the second branch of the evidence—that which arraigns the president, the apostles and the Mormon leaders generally, of living in open violation "of the laws of God and man," as the Mormon president has admitted—the matter goes far deeper. It has been shown by the witnesses that the Mormon Church is a political tyranny which has bound the State hand and foot, and throttled the freedom of the ballot. It dominates business as well as politics, holds entire communities in subjection, and by its dictation, renders worthless the constitutional rights of American citizens. It is a gigantic franchise robber. It tells its credulous followers that "it is the will of the Lord that you vote for such and such a candidate." It devised, as a ruse to acquire statehood for Utah, the manifesto suspending polygamy and then proceeded to violate its promises deliberately. It deposed Moses Thatcher from the Apostolate because he dared to run for office in opposition to its wishes, and refused to recognize its right to dictate to the voters of the State. Its many-wived president, with his various domestic establishments and his forty-two children, is a typical Grand Turk, who rules his harem, and his civil, political and religious subjects as despotically as a Sultan, glorying in his defiant violation of statute law and public decency. And his example, as has been admitted, is closely followed by practically all the apostles and by leading Mormons generally. To review their shameless testimony on the witness stand, with all its revolting details, their talk of "plural" wives, of marriage after death, of "sealing wives for time and eternity," and of the nature and extent of their domestic relations, would nauseate the average reader. It brought the quick blush of shame to the cheeks of many who heard the testimony before the Senate Committee.

By their own witnesses, the Mormons have proved that their whole system is vile from top to bottom, and antagonistic to the spirit of American institutions. They have proved that Utah is not a sovereign State, but a Territory held in abject political slavery to the Mormon Church. They have shocked the nation, and filled it with a sense of shame that this evil should have been tolerated so long. They have convinced all who heard them that, if the National and State laws were enforced, the entire Mormon leadership would now be compelled to answer for their deeds at the bar of justice.

We are glad and grateful that the truth has come out squarely at last, and that the mask has been torn off, revealing the Mormon system in all its naked hideousness. If Congress will apply the remedy, by such legislation as is necessary, its course will meet with universal approval. It will then remain for the various States to legislate for their own protection, by passing laws to stamp out the polygamous propaganda, and to save us from the further dissemination of this immorality. Our cities, towns, and villages need to be defended against the inculcators of these indecent doctrines, just as they are now protected against the circulation of vile literature and the perpetration of public immoralities in other forms. Above all, our homes should be impregnable shielded by statute against invasion by the army of workers constantly in the field, seeking fresh victims among the credulous and innocent, who are lured into far-off Mormon homes, only to learn, all too late, that they have been deceived and ruined.

THE "GROSSER KURFUERST"

The members of the Central Executive Committee in charge of the convention are E. K. Warren, of Michigan; W. N. Hartshorn, of Massachusetts; A. B. McCrillis, of Rhode Island, and Herbert E. Clark, United States Vice-Consul at Jerusalem. There are many prominent Sunday School workers in the party, among whom are the Rev. John Potts, of Toronto, chairman of the International Lesson Committee; C. G. Trumbull, editor of the Sunday School Times; W. J. Semelroth, editor of the World's Evangel; Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts, who goes as correspondent for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Marion Lawrence and Mrs. Mary Foster Bryner, of Chicago, are among the prominent field workers; also the Rev. Dr. Wallace Nutting, of Providence. It is worthy of note that while the last World's Convention was held in London, England, in 1898, there were but 200 delegates who went from America, while now the Grosser Kurfuerst carries no less than 800 enthusiastic travelers to the historic Bible lands.

Young Men Who Show Their Colors

THE YOUNG MEN'S PRESBYTERIAN UNION, OF CHICAGO, AND ITS REMARKABLE WORK

By JOHN WILLIS BAER

ANDREW STEVENSON

FROM the day of its organization (May 20, 1902), the Young Men's Presbyterian Union of Chicago has had remarkable success and unusual growth. God is in the movement and directs its ever onward and irresistible progress. An outgrowth of systematic Bible class work conducted in a few Presbyterian churches, its object is to establish fraternal relations between the members of the Young Men's Bible classes and clubs and kindred organizations, in the various Presbyterian churches of Chicago and its vicinity; to broaden the knowledge and efforts of young men along the line of intelligent Christian citizenship; to enlarge and improve the existing work; to assist in the establishment of new organizations, and to do everything possible to strengthen fellowship and friendship among Presbyterian young men.

This work is accomplished through six distinct departments, viz., Devotion, Fealty, Education, Citizenship, Organization, and Fellowship. The heads of these departments are vice-presidents, and, together with others, constitute an executive committee. The movement has its own organ, issued monthly, entitled Presbyterian Young Men. The enrolment at the beginning was thirty-two organizations, with a membership of nearly two thousand. During the next year there was a net increase of nine hundred members and twenty-nine organizations.

President Andrew Stevenson tells me that from the first days, the idea of a distinctively young men's work for young men, by young men, in Presbyterian churches, has met with satisfaction. In 1897, so far as known, there were but two Presbyterian Bible classes organized in Chicago for systematic work aside from Bible study. To-day there is this loyal legion of more than three thousand young men, banded together with a common name for a common Master against a common enemy. In 1897 there was some hospital visitation done by the Bible class members, while to-day aggressive work is undertaken along the six lines suggested by the organized departments for service. At the same time, the movement has strengthened the bonds of loyalty of the young men to their own church, in every way possible. Primarily and individually, these young men are receiving the best Bible instruction from intelligent teachers, and also are becoming collectively a splendid missionary and evangelistic force.

There are no brighter young men on the continent than these virile Christian laymen of Chicago. They come from every walk of life. There are lawyers, doctors, teachers, merchants, financiers, heads of mercantile institutions, and the wage earner from almost every honest occupation. Many hold unusually responsible positions in traffic associations, railroad companies, banks and municipal affairs. They are, indeed, picked men in the best sense of the word. With such men and such leaders good work has been done. The Union's campaign for Christian citizenship is calculated to have a large part in morally cleansing the city. Its plans are always practical, never partisan. Through its citizenship department, the Union rapped upon the door of many a pastor's study, and church bulletins and pulpit notices gave wholesome warning, and, as a consequence, Christian voters were stimulated to the performance of their duty as good citizens.

Through conferences of leaders of classes and in other ways, up-to-date methods of teaching men the Bible and interesting them in missionary and evangelistic work have been devised and practiced. I question very much if any city but Chicago has, for many a year, found a hundred of its leading young business and professional men gathered from their business at "high noon," to listen to the presentation of the need of personal work by men for men, and to hear representatives of mission boards tell them how their work is organized and conducted. Yet such was the case at two different times recently. At the Union League Club, Mr. James H. Eckels, former Comptroller of the United States Treasury, now president of one of Chicago's banks, introduced at a luncheon of business men, Mr. John H. Converse, of the Baldwin Locomotive Works, and Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, D.D., the leaders of the Presbyterian evangelistic movement. Both of these men made an appeal to the business men of Chicago to unite in a great soul-saving movement. Later, at a famous downtown restaurant, one hundred young men at noon left their desks and their business to listen to Mr. Robert E. Speer and another mission board representative, who told the story of the progress of missions at home and abroad. These meetings were held in the middle of a busy day, in the heart of the business swirl of Chicago, and it was the King's business only that was being reviewed. All honor to the Presbyterian young men of Chicago for this enterprise. At the time of the visit of these four Christian workers to Chicago, two men's mass meetings were held at night in a centrally located church, and one thousand men gathered, demonstrating beyond dispute that men can be interested in the deeper and mightier business of life when men believe in men.

There is always something unusually inspiring in an audience composed exclusively of men. The speakers accepted their opportunities as a trust from God, and did their best. Uplifting song services opened the meetings, led by Mr. E. O. Excell, and the unusual sound of a chorus of nearly a thousand of men's voices had a dignity and impressiveness which deeply stirred speakers as well as singers. "Men went out from the meetings speaking gladly of the inspiring success, and yet in their quiet faces showing that more than the success, they felt the meaning of the meeting and the burden of the duty it enforced. The results can be written by no human hand." President Stevenson of the Union hit the nail on the head when he said, afterward: "Beneath the feeling of gratification, one cannot help but feel chagrined that an occasion of this character is so rare and causes so much comment. Nevertheless, in a large measure, it is true that men are not naturally given to attending religious meetings. But conditions have changed, men will attend church, and not only the ordinary run of men, but men of high business standing and influence.

"Young men have awakened to the fact that the manliest men are those active in church work, and who associate with Christian men. Older men have come to the point where it is necessary for them to take a stand one way or the other, and as a result, those heretofore church members in name only are taking a decided stand for Christ, and are unhesitatingly showing their colors in business, as well as everywhere else. All classes of men, young and old, in our churches have joined hands, realizing that the best results can be accomplished by union of purpose and activity. Not only are young men organizing themselves into Bible classes and clubs, but older men are forming leagues and classes. The result is, that in the Presbyterian churches of Chicago to-day, at practically a moment's notice, our men can be brought together, and willingly, too, on any question which concerns the advance of the Kingdom of God on earth."

The Union is also, among other things, doing a social work which, though entirely secondary, is yet exceedingly important. Young men are being drawn from their boarding-houses into the warm atmosphere of homes and churches, and carefully prepared indoor and outdoor, musical, literary and athletic programmes are giving recreation, profit and delight.

I am glad that other denominations in Chicago and other Presbyterian churches in cities outside of Chicago, having heard of the splendid success, are taking steps to adopt and adapt the principles and methods of the Presbyterian Young Men's Union of Chicago. I know of no work east, west, north or south that has more vital Christian life, and I commend it to the wideawake readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. If more detailed and definite information is desired, I would suggest writing secretary Wilbur P. Blessing, Chicago Depository, Presbyterian Board of Publication, Chicago.

A MESSAGE FROM MADAGASCAR'S CHRISTIAN QUEEN

THE unifying influence of the Bible was strikingly illustrated at the Mission Conference held at Halle, in Prussia, from the 9th to the 11th of February. For the twenty-sixth time this annual gathering of friends and supporters of missions met under the leadership of the well-known Dr. Warneck, the Nestor among German authorities on missionary methods. With an attendance running into the thousands, this Conference is probably the most important annual religious convocation in Prussia. The chief address was that of Professor Dr. Kahler, on the theme, "The Bible, the Book of Humanity." One of the thoughts forcefully presented in the course of this was that the Bible is the Book of humanity, in that it enables the various nations of the earth to rightly understand one another. Of this the Halle Conference itself was a happy illustration. The missionary organizations participating actively in its proceedings were the various Berlin missionary societies, the Barmen Society and the Moravian Church—the last itself international alike in its membership and in the make-up of its board, Germany, Great Britain and the United States being represented.

The chief speaker at the Conference, however, was Director Dr. Boegner, of the Paris Missionary Society, the Church of the Huguenots; and the collections were divided between the first of the Berlin Missionary Societies and the Paris Society. Director Boegner, in describing especially the work of his society in Madagascar (where it has been instrumental in saving the work of British organizations from Jesuitical Romanization), in Basutoland and along the Zambesi, whilst stoutly proclaiming his devotion to his French fatherland, thanked God that the work of missions had taught him to understand and appreciate brethren of other nationalities in particular German and British. A pleasing incident of the Conference, not on the programme, was a message brought by a German professor, in the audience, who last November visited the last queen of Madagascar, now a prisoner of State in Algeria. She had bidden him take the first opportunity to thank the Missionary Society of Paris for its work in behalf of her people, whilst she testified to her own trust in the Gospel of Jesus, writing in his Bible as her farewell. Matt. 5: 8. Verily the Bible is the Book of humanity, and the great unifier of the nations.

Progress of the Far-Eastern Campaign

RUSSIAN SOLDIERS AND LABORERS REPAIRING A BREAK ON THE TRANS-BAIKAL RAILROAD

WINTER is slowly relaxing its grasp in Northern Korea and Manchuria. Ice still holds the rivers, and the deep snows, melting in the mountains, makes the valleys impassable for troops. Japan is pushing her forces steadily northward, in the direction of the Yalu. That river has been mined by the Russians at almost every point where the Japanese might attempt to cross.

Japan has now in Northern Korea somewhat less than 150,000 troops. Wiju, on the Korean side of the Yalu, where it was expected the first real stand of the campaign would be made, was on March 12 fired by the Russians (who were long entrenched there), and then evacuated. After retreating across the Yalu, news having been received of the near approach of the main body of the Japanese army. Some of the Japanese divisions, including infantry and artillery, are now north of the Yalu, and apparently are being held for a flanking movement against the Russians, who are now retreating northward, when the Japanese advance reaches the proper point.

In the neighborhood of Moukden, there is now a great Russian army, which is steadily growing. At Liao-Yang, the concentration of troops has compelled the desertion of their owners of hundreds of private buildings, where the soldiers are now quartered. Supplies are coming by the railroad with greater regularity. St. Petersburg dispatches claim that 2,500 Japanese, who landed at Plaskin Bay, Northern Korea, lately, intending to march upon Maccuorhon, have been cut off from the main Japanese force which landed at Port Lazareff later. The only roads by which these forces could effect junction are strongly held by Cosaks. Owing to the many reports of the landing of Japanese at various places, Admiral Alexieff has issued an order from military headquarters that the Russian Army Corps, which lately arrived at Harbin, should be detained here by the field staff. He adds: "There is some difficulty in providing suitable accommodations for this large force, owing to the severe frosts that have set in." It is doubtless true that many privations are endured by both armies in consequence of the severe weather. Correspondents with the Russian troops in Manchuria, represent them as camping in zero weather, three men to a tent. First the snow is cleared down to the soil, then the tent set up in the excavation, earth and straw strewn on top of the canvas and over all a thick layer of snow. Notwithstanding all precautions, there is much suffering among the troops. A dispatch to the London Standard says: "It is reported that starvation, cold and harsh treatment by their officers have broken the spirit of the troops, who are largely recruits. Many who have arrived at New Chwang from the country around are General Kouropatkin, the new Russian Commander of the Army, is quoted as saying of his plans and hopes in the Far Eastern campaign: "After crushing the Japanese in Korea and Manchuria, we will take their islands. If I have anything to say in the matter, the treaty of peace will be signed in Tokio, and nowhere else." This boast may be justified by events later. Kouropatkin is a determined fighter, and a man of quick resources.

There is a likelihood of considerable friction over the proposition by Russia to sink hulks at Yinkow, the port of New Chwang. Commander Sawyer, of the United States gunboat Helena, and the captain of a British gunboat protested against the blockade, New Chwang being a treaty port. It is understood that our State Department holds that the port should be kept open, and not included in the zone of war operations.

Admiral Makharoff's arrival at Port Arthur has effected a quick transformation, and put new life into Russia's naval campaign. He is an aggressive commander, and his first official act was to discard the defensive tactics of Admiral Stark, his predecessor, and to direct an attack on the enemy, at midnight, March 10, with torpedo boats only. The flotilla made a dash at the Japanese vessels, and each side lost a torpedo boat. The Russian boats then retired, as the big Japanese warships in the outer bay were coming up. From 9 A.M. until 1 P.M. hundreds of twelve-inch Japanese shells were fired at the fortress, whose batteries replied ineffectively. An effort was made by the Russian warships to rescue the crew of the torpedo boat Stereguschchi, which was surrounded by five Japanese cruisers, but it proved unavailing. The riddled torpedo boat sank; part of her crew was drowned, and the survivors were taken prisoners.

The bombardment which followed this naval affair was the most terrific and destructive to which Port Arthur has yet been subjected. Sixty Russians were killed on the fleet, in the forts and the town, and over a hundred injured. Golden Hill fort was badly damaged. The warship Retvizan was again hit and twenty of her crew killed. The new bank building and the army headquarters were destroyed. It is reported that the port will soon be evacuated, the forts being unable to return the Japanese fire. In this last engagement, Admiral Togo reports several Japanese vessels were injured, but none put out of action. Eleven Japanese were killed and nine wounded in this engagement.

dying from frost-bite. The losses from cold and sickness along the Yalu River are reported to be 2,000. The Russians are now withdrawing all superfluous troops from Port Arthur to Harbin and Kirin, owing to the shortness of provisions at Port Arthur."

Bon Voyage!

TO the eight hundred Pilgrims who are now en route to the Holy Land, to attend the World's Sunday School Convention, some as delegates and others as interested spectators, we extend cordial wishes for a safe and pleasant voyage. We doubt not that it will be an extremely profitable and agreeable pilgrimage. May the whole Christian world benefit by the outcome of this great international gathering, whose deliberations are to be directed mainly toward the extension of Gospel truth among the rising generation.

In olden times, a pilgrimage to Palestine was a mighty undertaking, not to be entered upon without much preparation. Then, as now, the land which was the scene of Christ's earthly sojourn was in the hands of the unbeliever. In those days the pilgrim was a veritable soldier of the Cross, and went forth with sword and spear, with the purpose of wresting from the Paynim Calvary and the Tomb. Some of the world's greatest wars have surged around that little strip of sea-coast, which the Turk has held with such grim determination through the centuries. His territorial grasp has not relaxed; but, thanks to the growing influence of Christian civilization, the sacred places are now open to worshippers from all parts of the earth. Believers of every denomination may now safely visit the places that were once hallowed by the Son of God. They can meditate on Olivet, and in Gethsemane; worship at the Bethlehem cradle, and kneel where once the Cross was lifted up, upon which the tragedy of the Atonement was consummated, and a lost world redeemed.

It is a great and blessed privilege that comes to the sincere soul on such a pilgrimage. To the pilgrims who make the journey, there is no longer any personal peril; but the spiritual blessing, the individual and collective uplift that is experienced, is unchanged. The uplifted Cross still has power to "draw all nations" unto Christ.

A Question of Fellowship

SERIOUS trouble has been caused in a Brooklyn church by a question which has disturbed many churches, and which, in the near future, will probably disturb many others. The question arose on the proposal to admit a wine merchant to membership. It was a clear case of principle—for there is not a word urged against the personal character of the candidate—who has attended the church for thirteen years, is a pewholder, a liberal giver, and of irreproachable private life. The pastor—who knows him well—declares him to be a sincere Christian, and all speak highly of his excellent character. Thus, the question was narrowed down to one of his business. The proposal to admit him was submitted to a vote of the church, and was carried by a majority, the pastor concurring; but the assistant pastor, who opposed it, handed in his resignation, and some of the officers and the members of the church have withdrawn. The division of the church, which may curtail its usefulness, is matter for regret; and it is due to the candidate, whose admission led to it, to say, that when he found that opposition to him was likely to arise, he showed his wisdom and delicacy by offering to withdraw his application for membership, but his offer was not accepted.

It may save similar trouble and avoid personal feeling, in other churches, if the question of fellowship were considered before such a proposal is made. If a rule were adopted, when there is no such candidate before the church, the question would stand a better chance of being decided on its merits. It is purely a question of consistency of life. No evangelical church would knowingly admit to membership a man whose life was inconsistent with the Christian character. A burglar, or a gambler, or a drunkard would be rejected without hesitation if he wished to join. If he gave evidence of repentance and avowed his intention of reforming, that would be a different matter; but so long as he was living a vicious life, a church would be justified in rejecting him. The Apostolic rule which was laid down when the question of immorality in a church arose, was, that while it was no part of the church's duty to judge "those that were without," the church must purge itself of the member who was leading an inconsistent life. The question, then, is whether a person who derives his income from making and selling intoxicants is consistent. It should not be difficult to decide. The testimony of judges, of jailers, of physicians is all on one side, and no ordinary person can read the daily papers, or observe what is passing around him, without agreeing with that testimony that no agent is doing so much mischief, directly or indirectly to the community as intoxicating liquor. What, then, are we to say of the conduct of a man who, while in Christian fellowship, is supplying the market with that identical agent? The apostle said, "If meat cause my brother to offend, I will eat no meat while the world standeth." It is several degrees below the Apostolic level for a man to provide that which causes his brother to offend.

It is worthy of consideration whether a church may not consistently go a step further, and refuse to benefit indirectly by the sale of this mischievous agent. We are shocked when we read of the brigands of central Europe bringing to the church a percentage of the proceeds of their murders and robberies, and of the offering being accepted. The time may come when the conscience of our churches will be so stirred by the appalling spectacle of the results of the liquor traffic, that they will say of the liquor dealer's offering: "This is the price of blood; we cannot accept it for the work of the Lord."

To Save Our Girls

NEW YORK, March 12, 1904.

DR. LOUIS KLOPSCH.—DEAR SIR: It has come to my knowledge that a great peril menaces the young women of our country at the coming Exposition at St. Louis. Thousands of young girls, the daughters of modest homes in the villages and hamlets remote from the great towns, are turning longing eyes to St. Louis. Some of them wish to see the Exposition, with its multifarious wonders; some desire the educational opportunity that will be afforded, while the vast majority are hoping that they may find employment in the city, or at the Exposition during the time that it is open. It is even stated, with a strong probability of truth, that an organized effort is being made to inveigle many of these innocent girls into doubtful places, where they may be the prey of unscrupulous and wicked people, and where some of them may be tempted into nameless dangers, and perhaps led into lives of shame. This evil is a menace to the peaceful home-life of America, and if allowed to go on would be a lasting blot upon our fair fame.

It has seemed to me that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, with its vast opportunities and great army of readers, might do something to help avert this impending peril. Many Christian women feel strongly on this subject at this time. I write merely to ask if THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will not co-operate in some plan to save our girls?

Very truly yours,

MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

We have written to Mrs. Sangster, informing her that we will gladly respond to this call for service in a cause of such vital interest to American womanhood.

We purpose, next week, to lay the whole matter before our readers, and invite their confidence and their active co-operation in stemming an evil which threatens to wreck many innocent lives, and to bring sorrow and shame into a multitude of happy homes.

Rumored Death of Dr. B. Labaree

BRIEF cable despatches from Urumiah, in Persia, report that Dr. Labari, an American missionary, has been killed on the road to Khoi. Though up to the time of going to press no confirmation of the sad news had been received by the Presbyterian Board in New York, there is reason to fear that the dispatch refers to Rev. Benjamin Labaree, D.D., one of the most eminent and devoted missionaries in the foreign field. During his stay in this city a few years ago, while revising the Syriac edition of the Bible, he was a frequent visitor at the office of this journal. His learning, his courtesy and affability, rendered him a most delightful friend, and his tragic death, if unhappily it should prove true, will be mourned by all who knew him.

Why anyone should want to kill so good and kind a man is inconceivable, but as the tragedy is said to have occurred on the road to Khoi, which is a centre of Mohammedan fanaticism, it may have been inspired by religious hatred, or possibly it may have been the work of Kurdish brigands, whose ruthless ferocity is proverbial. The whole Christian world will be bereaved by the loss of so good and so able a servant of Christ, if, indeed, he has fallen.

Niagara in Winter

NIAGARA has not in many years presented such beautiful ice scenery as it has this winter. The cold weather set in early, and continued steadily week after week, so that the frost effects kept building up day after day. It is in Prospect Park that the tree beauty attains its highest perfection, and this season the effects have been glorious in the extreme. It is here that a southwest wind carries the spray cloud of the American Fall well back into the park grove, and as it freezes the trees look as though they were hewn from purest marble. Trees, bushes, buildings, everything within reach of the falling spray becomes ice-coated, and to stand down at Prospect Point and look back into the park is a veritable view of fairyland. One amazing feature of the ice formation was a huge mound that developed on Prospect Point. Usually this view point is open to visitors the year around, but so massive did the ice mound grow that men dug day after day to keep the Point clear and then gave up in despair, for each night the quantity of ice that formed was greater than that removed during the day. Then it was that the big new mound, with its frozen, glassy surface, became itself a point of view that surpassed even the delights of the Point proper. On this icy hill, for such it was, one stood thirty feet or more above the water as it turned over the brink of the American Fall. To look down upon the Fall from such a point had never before been possible, and thousands flocked themselves of the new condition to see Niagara mind as he saw the train, with its hundred passengers, coming in. Instantly he leaped from the locomotive and started for the switch. Panting and gasping for breath, he neared the switch lever between the main and the switch tracks. There was no time to pull the lever. He threw himself at the lever, and his body fell across it. His weight snapped the lever from the catch and the switch closed. The train, with its many passengers aboard, rushed past in safety, but the switchman was dead. In throwing himself across the lever his head projected upon the main track and he was killed by the train. The funeral was attended by many employees of the railroad. Over the grave will be erected a tombstone with the epitaph, "He gave his life to save others." Pity that a man capable of such an act should have had to die in doing it; but so it is that lives are saved. The grievous thing is that when a world was to be saved by the sublimest of all such acts of in a new way. The rapids of the American channel above the American Fall were so suppressed by the gathered ice that it was through only three small and narrow channels that the flow of this portion of the great river reached the brink of the precipice and tumbled into the gorge. The entire middle section of the Fall was frozen over, and Superintendent Perry and Guide John R. Barlow made their way over the ice to a point at the brink of the Fall midway between Prospect Point and Luna Island, a spot which, so far as known, has never before been reached by man. The scene of the frozen river was beautiful, and one could not help compare its quietness with the tossing, tumbling, chaotic waters that roll there in summer time. Our meteorologists can give us scientific explanations of this remarkable phenomenon, but after all, they are obliged to go back of the laws which they have discovered, to the Great First Cause, as did the Oriental philosopher:

By the breath of God frost is given, and the breadth of the waters is straitened (Job 37: 10.)

Saved a Train

A switchman at Cleveland, O., gave up his life, a few days ago, in a successful effort to save a train from wreck. He was going from one part of the yard to another on a yard engine, when he saw a Lake Shore train approaching at a high rate of speed. It was already two hours late, and advantage had been taken of a delay to switch some cars on to another set of tracks. A switch had been opened for the purpose, and collection of the fact rushed on the switchman's self-sacrifice, there should have been failure in any instance. How many men for whom Christ laid down his life perish in spite of it, by their own perversity!

Ye would not come unto me that ye might have life (John 5: 40)

Boy and Dog Recovered

A mystery only partially solved was brought to the notice of the police in New York last week. Early in the week they were informed that a valuable dog, of the Great Dane breed, had been lost by its owner, a well-known music-teacher. The animal had strayed away from a friend of its owner, who had taken it with her for a stroll through the park. Search was made for it, but it was not found. Two days afterward the police were called upon to search for a missing boy, about five years old, who had wandered away from his nurse in the park. Late that evening they received word that both the lost boy and the lost dog had been found. They learned that the mother of the boy, almost distracted by her loss, had gone through the park and the streets near it, searching for her darling. She had almost worn out her strength, when she saw a crowd of men and boys surrounding some object in the roadway. Hearing that it was a lost child she pressed through, and there on the ground was her boy crying bitterly, and over him stood a big dog, protecting him and snarling menacingly at any one who approached the child. She called to her boy, and with a cry of joy he rushed to her arms. She took him thankfully to her home, the dog following at her heels. When she arrived at home she looked at the dog and found that it had a collar on, with its owner's name and address. Thankful for the protection it had given her child, she sent word to the dog's owner, who lost no time in coming for it. Where the dog had been, and why it had taken the child under its protection, cannot be explained, but that it did so and was thereby restored to its home, are the facts. The animal reaped the reward of an act of kindness, and thus to him was fulfilled the promise made to men:

He that watereth shall be watered also himself (Prov 11: 25)

A Wild Ride Down a Mountain

A railroad employee had a thrilling experience on a mountain in New Jersey, recently. He is a brakeman, and was standing on a car, piled with ore, near the Richard mine, waiting for a train, to which the car was to be attached for hauling down the incline. In some way, which the brakeman cannot explain, the car slowly moved, and its momentum increasing every moment, it started down the mountain-side. He at once applied the brakes, but they failed to work. The car was soon flying down the slope at a terrific rate of speed. It is about five miles from the top to the bottom of the slope, and there was no obstruction until the end of the third mile. There a passenger work car was standing. The ore car smashed into this, demolishing it and throwing it off the track. The car continued its wild flight unchecked, and passed the Lackawanna station, the brakeman clinging to the brake for his life. By some marvel, the car kept the track until it struck the next up-grade, and he was then able to set the brakes and bring the car to a standstill. After that he fainted. Although he had been badly bruised when the passenger car was smashed, he was not seriously injured. It was a marvelous escape. Not many have had such an experience and lived to tell the tale. How few there are, too, who travel the downward path in morals, where, as so often happens, the checks on which they rely, fail to work escape from eternal destruction.

As the whirlwind passeth, so is the wicked no more (Prov 10: 25)

BRIEF NOTES

There are now 6,838 preaching-stations in Africa, and the number of foreign missionaries laboring on that continent is 3,051.

The membership of the Metropolitan Tabernacle in London, of which C. H. Spurgeon was pastor, and is now under the charge of his son, has a membership of 3,258, of which 121 were added last year.

News comes from California of the death of Rev. E. A. Holdridge, an evangelist of rare power and devotion. His home church was at Modesto but his service was carried on in many other towns and was signally blessed of God. Mr. Holdridge was fifty-two years of age and had been in the ministry nearly thirty years. He was instrumental in bringing many souls to Christ. At one of his services in California, nearly two hundred persons were at the altar at one time.

Evangelist Sayford has been holding revival meetings at Concord, N. H. The Monitor of that city, recording the wonderful scene at the time the invitation to rise for prayer was given, says: "There were few arose at first, but as conviction was driven home in the silence of breathless interest, almost, a new light would come into the eyes and an inspiration seemed to take possession of one after another."

JOSEPH AND ASENATH

TRANSLATED FROM THE GREEK BY REV. BERNHARD PICK, PH.D., DD

CONCLUDED FROM LAST WEEK

VI. The Wedding of Joseph and Asenath

THE steward then went away, and prepared the house and the meal, but Asenath remembered the words of the vision and the injunctions, and hastened to her second room, and took out her best dress, which was glittering like lightning, and put it on, she also put on her royal girdle of gold and precious stones, and on her hands she put golden bracelets, and on the feet golden sandals and a precious ornament around her neck, and a golden crown upon her head; in the crown, near by her forehead, was a large precious stone, and round the large stone, six very costly stones, and her head she covered with a very wonderful veil. As Asenath remembered the words of her house steward, for he had told her that her face had fallen away, she sighed very sorrowfully and said: "Woe is me, the distressed, because my face has fallen away; Joseph will see me, and I shall be despised."

And to her maiden she said: "Fetch me water from the pure spring." When it was brought, she poured it into a dish, and, stooping down to wash her face, she saw her own face bright as the sun. When she saw this, she was astonished at the sight, and she was greatly rejoiced, and washed not her face.

Again her steward came to tell her that everything was done according to her behest. And when he looked at her, he was greatly afraid and was trembling for a long time, and falling to her feet, he said: "What is this, my mistress? What is this beauty which is laid on thee, it being great and wonderful?"

And while they were yet speaking, a lad came to Asenath saying: "Behold, Joseph stands before the gates of our court." At this Asenath hastened and went down the steps from her upper room, with her seven maidens, to meet Joseph, and stood before her house. When Joseph had entered the court, the gates were closed, and the strangers were left outside.

And when Asenath came forward to meet Joseph, he was astonished at her beauty when he saw her, and said to her: "Who art thou, maiden? Tell me quickly." She said to him: "I am Asenath, thy handmaid. All idols I have cast away from me, and they are destroyed. A vision came to me this day from heaven and said to me: 'I have given thee for a bride to Joseph, and he shall be thy bridegroom forever; and thy name shall not be called Asenath, but it shall be called a City of Refuge, and the Lord God shall rule over many nations, and through thee shall they flee to the Most High God.' The vision also said: 'I will also go to Joseph that I may speak into his ears my words concerning thee,' and now thou knowest, my lord, whether that has come to thee which was spoken concerning me."

Then Joseph said to Asenath: "Blessed art thou, O woman, and blessed be thy name, because the Lord God has founded thy walls, and the children of the living God shall dwell in the city of thy refuge, and the Lord shall rule them forever. That vision came to me this day from heaven, and spoke to me these words concerning thee; and now come hither to me, why standest thou afar from me?"

Joseph then stretched forth his hands, and embraced Asenath.

And after they had greeted each other, and bound together the bands of their hands, Asenath said to Joseph: "Come hither, my lord, and go into the house, because I have prepared our house and a table."

And she took hold of his right hand, and led him into the house, and placed him on the throne of her father, Pentephres. She also brought water to wash his feet. And Joseph said: "Let one of the maidens come and wash my feet." And Asenath said to him: "Nay, lord, for from now thou art my lord, and I thy servant; and why doest thou ask thus that another servant should wash thy feet?"

Joseph then took her and he seated her upon his right hand. Her father and her mother, and her relatives came from the field of their inheritance, and saw her sitting with Joseph, and attired in her wedding-robe. And they were surprised at her beauty, and rejoiced and praised God. Then they ate and drank and rejoiced together.

And Pentephres said to Joseph: "To-morrow I will call all the chiefs and satraps of all the land of Egypt, and will make for you a wedding, and thou shalt take my daughter Asenath for a wife."

But Joseph replied: "I will go to-morrow to King Pharaoh, for he is my father, who made me a ruler of all this land, and will speak to him about Asenath, and he will give her to me for a wife." And Pentephres said to him: "Go in peace."

And Joseph went to Pharaoh and said to him: "Give me Asenath, the daughter of Pentephres, the priest of Heliopolis, for a wife."

Pharaoh rejoiced very much, and said to Joseph: "Behold, is she not promised to thee for a wife? Take her, therefore, for a wife now and for ever."

"AND JACOB SAID TO JOSEPH, 'IS THIS THY WIFE?'"

Pharaoh sent then for Pentephres, and Pentephres brought Asenath and put her before Pharaoh, who, when he saw her, was astonished at her beauty, and said: "The Lord God of Joseph bless thee, child, and may this thy beauty remain for ever, because the Lord God of Joseph has chosen thee for his bride."

After this, Pharaoh took Joseph and Asenath and put golden crowns upon their heads, such as were in his house from of old, and Pharaoh put Asenath to the right of Joseph. Putting his hands upon their heads, Pharaoh said: "The Lord God the Most High bless you, and multiply you and make you great and magnify you for ever."

Pharaoh then turned their faces to each other, and they kissed each other. And Pharaoh made a great banquet for Joseph for seven days, and called together all the rulers of Egypt and all the kings of the nations, making known throughout the land of Egypt: "That whoever works during the seven days of the wedding of Joseph and Asenath shall suffer death."

And Asenath bore to Joseph two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim, in the house of Joseph.

VI. The Plot of Pharaoh's Son

When the seven years of plenty had passed, the seven years of famine commenced. And when Jacob heard of his son Joseph, he went into Egypt with his family, in the second year of the famine, in the second month, on the twenty-first day of the month, and dwelt in the land of Goshen.

And Asenath said to Joseph: "I will go and see my father, for thy father Israel is as my father."

And Joseph said to her: "Thou shalt go with me to see my father."

So Joseph and Asenath went to Jacob in the land of Goshen, and the brothers of Joseph went forth to meet them and bowed before them, with their faces to the ground.

After this, both went to Jacob. Jacob was sitting upon his bed, and was very old. When Asenath saw him, she was surprised at his venerable beauty, for his age was like the youth of a man; his head was as white as snow, and the hair of his head was very thick and full; his white beard reached to his breast; his eyes were bright as with lightning; his shoulders and arms, his limbs and feet, were like those of a strong man.

When Asenath saw him thus, she was astonished, and falling down she bowed before him, her face to the ground.

Jacob said to Joseph: "Is this thy wife? Blessed be she in the Most High God."

Jacob called her then to him, and blessed her and saluted her. Asenath stretched forth her hands, and took hold of Jacob's neck and hung on it, and saluted him. They then ate and drank and afterwards Joseph and Asenath returned to their house; Simeon and Levi, the sons of Leah accompanied them, but the sons of Bilhah and Zilpah, the handmaids of Leah and Rachel accompanied them not, because they envied and hated them. And Levi was to the right of Asenath, and Simeon to the left. As Asenath took hold of Levi's hand, because she loved him more than the other brothers of Joseph, for he was a wise man and prophet of the Most High God. And he saw letters written in the heaven and understood them, and revealed them secretly to Asenath; Levi also loved Asenath greatly.

And it came to pass, as Joseph and Asenath, on their way from Jacob, passed by, that Pharaoh's first-born son saw them from the wall, and beholding Asenath, marvelled on account of her great beauty. Pharaoh's son then sent messengers, and sent for Simeon and Levi. They came, and when they stood before him, Pharaoh's first-born son said to them: "I know that ye are mighty men, and that with the sword of your right hands the city of the Shechemites was destroyed, and that with your two swords, you put down their warriors. I, too, will take you this day for my comrades, and will give you much gold and silver, man-servants and maid-servants and houses and large possessions, and ye shall aid me for I have been treated very shamefully by your brother Joseph, when he took Asenath for his wife, she being promised to me first. And now come to me, and I will fight against Joseph to kill him with my sword, and I will take Asenath for a wife, and ye shall be to me as brothers and true friends. If ye do not listen to my words, I will slay you."

And having spoken thus, he uncovered his sword and showed it to them. Now Simeon was desperate and bold, and desired to put his right hand on his sword and to strike the son of Pharaoh, because he had spoken harsh words to them. When, therefore, Levi perceived the thought of his heart (for he was a prophet), he touched with his foot the right foot of Simeon and pressed it, giving a signal to him to cease from his wrath.

Levi said to Simeon: "Why art thou angry at this man? We are God-fearing men, and it becomes us not to repay evil for evil."

Then said Levi to Pharaoh's son with boldness: "Why does our Lord speak these words? We are God-fearing men, and our father is a friend of the Most High God, and our brother is as his son. And how shall we do this evil thing, and sin before our God, and father Israel, and before our brother Joseph? And hear my words: It becometh us not to wrong any man in any wise. If one will wrong a God-fearing man, that man avenges him not, because he has no sword in his hand. And now take heed lest ye speak unto us such things about our brother Joseph. If thou abidest by thy evil counsel, behold, our swords are drawn before thee."

Then Simeon and Levi drew their swords from their sheaths, and said: "Seest thou now these swords? With these has the Lord avenged the pride of the Shechemites, with which they insulted the children of Israel in their sister Dinah."

When Pharaoh's son saw the drawn swords, he was much afraid, and trembled, because they glittered like flames of fire, and his eyes became dim, and he fell upon his face on the earth at their feet.

Levi then stretched forth the right hand and seized him, saying: "Arise and fear not, only take heed to speak no more anything evil against our brother Joseph." And Simeon as well as Levi went away from him.

The Son of Pharaoh remained therefore filled with grief and sadness, because he feared the brothers of Joseph. He became very angry again, and on account of the beauty of Asenath he mourned the more. His servants then said to him: "Behold, the sons of Bilhah, and the sons of Zilpah, the maids of Leah and Rachel, Joseph's wives, are much at enmity with Joseph and Asenath, and hate them. These shall be to thee in all things according to thy will."

The son of Pharaoh then sent messengers to them and called them, and they came to him in the first hour of the night. When they stood before him, he said to them, "I have heard from many that you are mighty men."

And Dan and Gad, the older brothers, said to him, "Let our lord speak to his servants what he wishes, that thy servants may hear, and that we may do as thou willest."

When Pharaoh's son was very glad, and said to his servants, "Go away a little from me because my word to these men is in secret." And all stood back.

Then Pharaoh's son said, "Behold, blessing and death are before you; take ye rather blessing than death, for ye are strong men and ye shall not be like women, but bidden and keep off your enemies; for I heard your brother Joseph say to Pharaoh, 'My father, Dan and Gad and Naphtali and Asher are not my brothers, but children of my father's maidens. I only wait for my father's death, and I will destroy them from the land and all their families, that they may not inherit with us. They also sold me unto the Ishmaelites, and I will recompense them according to their violence which they acted against me; only let my father die.'"

And my father, Pharaoh, praised him at these words, and said to him, 'Thou hast spoken well, my son; moreover, take from my mighty men and instruct them concerning all what they shall do for thee, and I will also assist thee.'

When Dan and Gad heard this from Pharaoh's son, they were greatly alarmed and distressed, and said to him: "We pray thee, help us; from now, we are thy slaves and servants, and we will die with thee."

And Pharaoh's son said, "I will help you if you also hear my words."

They said to him: "Tell us what thou wilt, and we will do according to thy will."

And Pharaoh's son said unto them: "I will kill my father this night, because Pharaoh is like a father unto Joseph, and promises to assist him against you. Kill ye Joseph, and I will take Asenath to wife, and ye shall be my brothers and joint-heirs of all that is mine; only do this."

And Dan and Gad said unto him: "We are this day thy servants, and we will do all that which thou hast assigned to us. We also heard Joseph say to Asenath, 'Go to-morrow into the field of our possession, for its harvest time,' and he sent with her six hundred strong men for an army, and fifty forerunners. Now, help us, and we will speak to our lord."

And they spoke to him all their mind in secret.

VII. The Ambush by the Stream

Pharaoh's son then gave to the four brothers full five hundred men, and made them their rulers and leaders. And Dan and Gad said unto him: "We are this day thy servants, and will do all, as thou hast told us. We will go by night and lie in wait by the stream, and hide ourselves in the thicket; but do thou take with thee five archers on horses, and go at a distance before her, when Asenath comes, she will fall into our hands, and we will put down the men who are with her. She will then flee with her chariot and fall into thy hands, as thou shalt do with her as it pleaseth thee. After that, we will kill Joseph, who will sorrow for Asenath, and we will kill his children also before his eyes."

Then the first-born son of Pharaoh heard this, he greatly rejoiced, and sent them away, and two thousand warriors with them. And as they went to the stream to hide themselves in the thicket, they sat on the further side of the stream, as towards the front on both sides of the way, full five hundred men; likewise on the near side of the stream remained the rest, and they sat in the thicket on both sides of the way, five hundred men.

In the same night Pharaoh's son arose and went to the bedchamber of his father to kill him. The guard of his father prevented him from going into his father's room, and said to him: "What is your desire, lord?"

He said to them: "I wish to see my father, for I go to take the sap off my newly planted vine."

And the guard said to him: "Thy father is in pain, and has watched the whole night, and now he rests; and he has said to us: 'Let no one come to me, even if it were my first-born son.'"

When he heard this, he went away enraged, and at once took fifty archers on horses and went before them as Dan and Gad had told him. But the younger brothers, Naphtali and Asher, spoke to their older brothers, Dan and Gad, saying: "Why do you again deal knavishly against your father, Israel, and against your brother, Joseph? God preserveth him like the pupil of the eye. Have you not once sold Joseph, and he is this day ruler over all the land of Egypt, and the giver of bread? If you will now again deal knavishly against him, he will cry to the Most High, and he will send fire from heaven and eat you up, and the angels of God will war against you."

PHARAOH'S SON TAKEN BEFORE HIS ROYAL FATHER

At this, the older brothers became angry against them, and said: "And shall we die like women? This shall not be." And they went forth to meet Joseph and Asenath.

And Asenath arose in the morning and said to Joseph: "I will go into the field of our possession, as thou hast said; but my soul is very sad, because thou shalt be separated from me."

And Joseph said to her: "Be of good cheer and fear not, but rather go rejoicing, dreading none, for the Lord is with thee, and he will keep thee from every evil; and I will go on my way distributing corn, and I will give corn to all the men in the city, and no man shall die of hunger in the land of Egypt."

Asenath then went her way, and Joseph also his way, distributing corn. As Asenath came to the place of the stream with the six hundred men, those who were with Pharaoh's son came suddenly from ambush, and began to fight with Asenath's men; and killed them with their swords and also all the forerunners. Asenath fled in her chariot.

At once Levi, the son of Leah, perceived all this in the spirit, like a prophet, and he told his brethren of Asenath's danger, and every man among them took his sword and his shield and his spears, and followed after Asenath quickly.

And as Asenath fled before, behold Pharaoh's son and his riders with him met her. When Asenath saw him, she was much afraid, and she called upon the name of the Lord her God.

Benjamin sat to her right, on the chariot. Now Benjamin was a strong youth of nineteen years, and he also was very God-fearing. And Benjamin leaped down from the chariot, and took a round stone from the stream, and he threw it at Pharaoh's son, and struck his left temple, and wounded him with a sore wound. And he fell from his horse to the ground, being half-dead. And then running likewise near the rock, Benjamin said unto Asenath's chariot driver: "Give me stones from the stream." And he gave him fifty stones; and, throwing the stones, Benjamin slew the fifty men who were with Pharaoh's son.

Then Leah's sons, Reuben and Simeon, Levi and Judah, Issachar and Zebulun, encountered the men who laid in wait for Asenath and fell upon them unawares, and slew them with a great slaughter.

But the sons of Bilhah and Zilpah fled before, and said: "We shall perish from the midst of our brethren; Pharaoh's son has also fallen by the hand of Benjamin, and all who were with him have perished by his hand. For the rest (those who were left) said: 'Come, now, let us kill Asenath and Benjamin, and flee into the thicket.' And they went towards Asenath, their swords being covered with much blood. When Asenath saw them, she was much afraid, and said: 'O Lord God, who hast made me alive and hast redeemed me from the idols and the corruption of death, as thou hast said that my soul shall live forever, deliver me now from these evil men.' And the Lord God heard the voice of Asenath, and the swords of the enemies fell from their hands to the ground, and they were powerless."

VIII. The Mercy of Asenath

When the sons of Bilhah and Zilpah saw this wonderful thing that had taken place, they were sore afraid, and said: "The Lord battles against us for Asenath."

They then fell upon their faces to the earth, and bowed to Asenath, and said: "Be merciful unto us, thy servants, for thou art our mistress and queen. We have, indeed, done a wicked thing against thee, and against our brother Joseph, but the Lord has requited us according to our deeds. Therefore, we pray thee, be merciful unto us, the mean and unworthy, and deliver us from the hand of our brethren; yet, they will become thine avengers, and their swords are before us [and we know that our brethren are God-fearing men, and repay no man evil with evil]. Be therefore merciful to thy servants, O mistress, in their presence."

And Asenath said to them: "Be of good cheer, and fear not your brethren, for they are God-fearing men and fear the Lord. Go then into the thicket till I appease them concerning you, and their wrath be stayed, because ye have undertaken evil things against them. The Lord shall see, and judge between me and thee."

Gad and Dan then betook themselves to the thicket; but their brothers, the sons of Leah, ran like stags in great haste after them. And Asenath descended from her chariot and received them with tears, and they, falling down before her to the ground, wept with a loud voice and sought to destroy their brothers.

And Asenath said to them: "I pray you, spare your brothers and repay them not evil for evil; for the Lord has saved me from them, and dashed their spears and swords from their hands. And this is sufficient for us that the Lord battles for us. Therefore, spare ye your brothers, because they are your brothers and blood of your father, Israel."

And Simeon said to her: "Why does our mistress speak good words for her enemies? Not so; but we will rather slay them with our swords, because they devised evil things against our brother Joseph and against their father Israel, and against thee, our mistress, this day."

Asenath then stretched forth her right hand to Simeon and said: "By no means, brother, shalt thou repay thy neighbor evil with evil, because the Lord will avenge this violence. They are, moreover, your brothers, and the sons of your father, Israel, and they fled from afar, before your face. Therefore, pardon them."

Levi then came to her and kissed her right hand, for he knew that she wished to save the men from the wrath of their brethren that they should not kill them. And they were near by in the thicket. Levi, his brother, knew it, but did not tell it to his brethren, fearing lest in their wrath they might kill them.

Pharaoh's son rose up from the ground and sat down and spat blood from his mouth; from the temple the blood ran down upon his mouth. And Benjamin running upon him, took his sword, and drawing it from the sheath of Pharaoh's son (for Benjamin had not a sword), he moved to strike upon the breast the son of Pharaoh. But Levi ran to him, and taking hold of his hand, he said: "By no means shalt thou do this work,

MARK 7: 24-37

GOLDEN TEXT -- HEB. 11: 6:
WITHOUT FAITH IT IS IMPOSSIBLE TO PLEASE HIM

WE can imagine the Syro-Phoenician woman saying: "You ask how I, a Syro-Phoenician woman, came to call on Jesus, a Jew, for help. I do not deny that I belong to a nation of idolaters. I myself have worshiped Baal; aye, more, my first-born I sacrificed to Baal by fire. Oh, how I shudder now to think how misguided I was to do such a cruel deed! How many mothers have laid their little ones on his red-hot hands, only to see them drop into the raging flames below! It was the kindness of Jesus to little children that first drew me to him. I had been told how he had cured the nobleman's boy; how he had raised from the dead the little daughter of Jairus; how he had cured many sick children brought to him when he was in Capernaum; and I said, 'Why not my child?' She had been afflicted with epilepsy for many months. I had been repeatedly told that as I was not a Jew, Jesus would not heed my request; but I reminded them who thus spoke, that Jesus had saved the life of a Roman boy. My child was so ill, I did not dare to journey far to tell Jesus of her need of him, lest she might fall into the fire in one of her paroxysms while I was away. But one day I learned with joy that Jesus had come into the borders of our country, and was even then abiding in a home not far away, for rest and refreshment.

"I lost no time in going thither. I did not go as an idol-worshiper, driven out of her religion by an extremity, for I had heard so much of Jesus, I was ready to take him for my Lord and Master. Love and necessity overcame all obstacles. I rushed into his presence; I threw myself at his feet; I cried aloud: 'Lord, help me!' But he seemed cold, even indifferent. Ah me, it was so different from what I had expected! I heard with anguish some words he spoke about helping those who belonged to the house of Israel. But I would not be refused. I cried louder still: 'Lord, help me!' Those who were with him were offended, and even asked that he would send me away. His own words were again discouraging, for he said: 'Let Israel first be helped; it is not meet to take the children's bread and cast it to dogs.' Was I then as a dog in his sight? I was willing to be even so considered, and I said: 'Even the little dogs under the table eat of the crumbs which the children drop.' All I wanted was one little crumb of help from him. He had heard me call him 'Lord' and 'Master,' and he knew that I was no longer a worshiper of Baal. Then why did he seem to refuse me help? I know now that he wanted his apostles to know that I was indeed a true and earnest worshiper, though not a Jew. Never can I forget the sweetness of his voice, nor the tender approbation of his look when he said: 'O, woman, great is thy faith; for this saying go thy way; be it done unto thee even as thou wilt, the demon has gone out of thy daughter.'"

"I clasped his feet with gratitude, and washed them with my tears of joy, and then I arose quickly, and went to my home, nothing doubting. I found my little daughter lying on her bed, resting in a healthful sleep. One little hand laid under her rosy cheek, and the other was tossed above her sunny curls. When she awoke it was with a smile of loving recognition, and then she said: 'Why, mamma, I feel so well! How did I get well so quickly?' And then I took her on my knee, and told her all about it. Her eyes filled with tears of thankfulness, and she clasped me around the neck, and cried: 'Oh, mamma, how I wish I could see Jesus, who has done so much for me!' Idolatry had cruelly deprived me of one child, but the religion of Jesus had restored another child to me. What a contrast between the false and the true. As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord."

After the healing of the Syro-Phoenician child, Jesus went on his way, crossing the Jordan just above Lake Merom. He traveled in a southeasterly direction, until he came to Decapolis, south of the sea of Galilee, on the east side of the Jordan. There were ten Gentile cities there. Almost the first act of Jesus in that missionary tour among the heathen was to heal a deaf and dumb man who had been brought to him. The man had to be charged against talking too much about it, lest crowds of curious people should gather, and make it impossible for Jesus to go on with his work.

Illustration and Application

As the lessons are now in the very midst of Christ's life, teachers may well assume that his resurrection and our own will be sufficiently treated by the preacher in his Easter morning sermon, and devote this lesson to the larger spiritual and missionary meanings of Easter, which Paul embodied in what may well be our Easter Golden text, "If ye then be risen with Christ seek those things that are above." Both miracles in this lesson were wrought in a missionary tour to heathen lands adjoining Palestine.

These resurrections, from sickness into health, from silence into song, picture the spiritual transformations, which are indeed a "passing from death unto life," that Christianity has wrought as it has marched through all countries in the nineteen Christian centuries since he made that first brief missionary tour. Let us not forget that Europe was a missionary country when Paul entered it at Philippi and wrought, in Christ's Name, two greater resurrections than those of this lesson, by which Lydia first, and then the jailer, rose, as from the dead, into the new Christian life. Far greater has been the resurrection of heathen Europe, whose present condition, with all its faults, differs from that of the days of Marcus Aurelius, the best of the pagan emperors, as life differs from death. We need not linger to debate about Christ's miracles of healing, when transformed characters and continents furnish nearer and stronger proofs of the life-giving power of Christ.

Especially has the influence of Christ produced changes kindred to resurrection in the condition of women and children. Well may the mother of this story and others of her time be imagined as journeying to Jerusalem, when Jesus had been crucified, to lift their children up before the cross, and tell his story there, for the Crucified and Risen Christ has lifted up both mother and child, who were treated as the slaves of the husband and father until Jesus taught the sacred individuality of every human soul as a son or daughter of God, a brother or sister of Christ, for whom he died, and so a brother or sister of every human being, to be loved and helped, not hated or harmed. Surely this is more than resurrection! And the pictures of women in mourning at the resurrection, yet with glad faces, gets added meaning from what the risen Christ has since done for women in all lands.

In the presence of this lesson, which is, first of all, a lesson on prayer, we may learn that prayer should be not only important but world-embracing. Private and family prayer often need a resurrection out of a death-like selfishness. Beautiful as parental love is, our duties to the great world sometimes outrank it. A man whose duty it was to watch a railway drawbridge over a river, had opened it to let a vessel through, when he heard the whistle of an approaching train. He sprang to the lever to bring it back into place, and in doing so accidentally pushed his boy overboard. To have stopped to save his boy would have caused the wreck of a trainload of people. He did his duty even at the loss of his boy, and all must see that in such a case there are duties that even outrank those of the family.

What shall we say of those spiritually dead Christians who do not even have family prayer and family religion, much less a missionary spirit that takes in the world? At the close of a revival meeting, the preacher walked away with a young man, to whom he said, "Are you a Christian?" "I am not." "Is your father a Christian?" "Don't know; he has been a steward for years in the church." "Is your mother a Christian?" "Don't know; she has long been a Superintendent of the Sunday School." "Is your sister a Christian?" "Don't know; she has the primary department of the Sunday School." "Does your father or mother ever ask the blessing at table?" "No, sir." "Did your father, or mother, or sister, ever ask you to be a Christian?" "So long as I can remember, not one of them ever said a word to me about my soul. Do you believe they think that I am lost?" This is a missionary story about the real "heathen at home."

As the lesson tells of a girl and a man that Jesus healed, our Easter missionary resurrection stories shall be of a girl and a man brought "from death unto life" in Chinese missions. Chwin Shioh was a little Chinese girl who lived in a dirty hut, with a roof of mats, and a floor of mud. She worked hard as the family drudge, with only harsh words and blows for reward—for the Chinese have almost a contempt for girls. Her work was the harder because her feet had been bound when she was four years old, but she was full of these disfigured little feet, which the Chinese call "golden lilies." She grew up without learning to read or write, or sew, but learned to worship a little idol, and a tablet inscribed with the name of her grandfather. This worship did not at all prevent her from repeating the backward language she heard, and copying dirty and bad habits of hers about her. When she was ten years old, she hurt one of her little feet, and as it was tightly bound, she had no chance to get well. A passing neighbor said: "Why don't you take her to the missionary hospital?" "Because they pay for children, and take their eyes out, and send them to England to make medicine." "Indeed they don't, for I was there myself, and I wish I could go again, for they make everybody so comfortable." So the child was allowed to limp to the missionary hospital. There she was put in a clean bed, and her feet were unbound, and she was dressed with cool ointment, and she was left to look at a picture of the Good Shepherd carrying a lamb. She wondered what it meant, but when she became comfortable, she did not wish to keep clean, and used bad language, and was so disobedient, that it was decided she must be sent back to her dirty home. One night before she was two, the lady doctor stopped at her bed, and said: "She is going to-morrow. We are all so sorry that you won't try to be good." Chwin Shioh said nothing. "Do you know why?" the child replied gruffly, "It is because we love you." The lady doctor laid a gentle white hand on the brown hand, and looked sorrowfully down on her. Chwin Shioh gazed at the gentle face above her for one long moment working, and then burst into tears. Nobody had ever loved her before. In that hour she ceased to be wild and wilful, and quiet in her bed, doing all she could to help the doctors cure her. She never went back to her loveless home. From the missionary hospital she went to a missionary school near by, where she learned to wonder how Jesus led her even unto death.

As she had done with the doctor, she loved him back, and helped him to save others, by becoming a missionary teacher. From this "miracle of grace," wrought on a wayward child of ten, we turn to another missionary miracle, the conversion of a Chinese man of eighty. He had been a lay helper of the Buddhist priests at Ha-pu for twenty-five years. A missionary found him in a wayside rest-shed, with a shelf full of mud idols. He talked with him of the uselessness of idol worship, to which he agreed. The next day he came to the missionary service half a mile away. The missionary was away, and on his return a month later, received, through a catechist, a present of the old man's priestly hat and robes. He was at the service that day, and the missionary was home with him after service, and found that he had smashed all his mud idols, and his daughter had swept them into a dust-heap. He continued to keep the rest-shed, finding in the daily inquiries of passers-by as to what had become of his idols, opportunity to proclaim the true God. A life transformed at eighty—what a resurrection was that!

There is yet another way in which to bring the Easter truths into the portion of the life of Christ, which we are now studying, namely, by reversing the lessons of April 3 and showing how Christ foretold his death and resurrection at this period in his ministry. His apostles could not understand how a miracle-working Messiah would die, and probably thought "crucifixion" and "resurrection" were figurative ways of speaking of some great Messianic battle and victory, which led them straightway to debate as to should be "greatest," that is, who should be his, the Messiah's, cabinet officers in the earthly kingdom, to which they thought he was leading them swiftly. The crucifixion and resurrection were indeed battle and victory, but not against themselves and Israel were to reap its benefits, which were to be for all the world, aye for both worlds.

AROUND THE HEARTH

Outside Work of Women

IN a village not too far from New York to be in effect a residential suburb of that great city, there has recently been much breaking of the Lord's Day. A splendid avenue, broad and firm, has invited men to race their swift horses there, as what with dashing equipages, automobiles, bicycles, and riders on horseback, the Sabbath quiet has been rudely invaded, to the sorrow of Christian people who are anxious to keep holy the rest day, and to keep peaceful their homes during its sacred hours.

On the statute books of the State there is ample provision for the protection of the Sabbath, and law-breaking goes on with an accumulation of penalties, wherever there is want of desecration of the day.

In the place referred to, there were many who regretted the continual rapid driving and racing on Sundays, but nobody stirred in the matter until the women of the town reonstrated. They belonged to the Women's National Sabbath Alliance, at least a goodly number of them did, and they addressed petitions to the men in authority, wrote letters to the local papers, and in various ways inaugurated a steady and persistent opposition which was presently successful. The tranquility of the Lord's Day was restored, through the efforts of a few brave gentlewomen, who fearlessly obeyed the dictates of their conscience.

This is one proof among many of the influence exerted by women in work outside their immediate households. The twentieth century begins auspiciously for the world, when wives and mothers, long accustomed to detail and administration in their own homes, now bring to bear their good judgment and common sense in what we may call town housekeeping.

A New Jersey village, within an hour of Manhattan, had great possibilities of beauty, but it was littered with unsightly debris, its fences were covered with flaming advertisements of doubtful propriety, and its business centre was dirty and untidy.

The men were indifferent in the matter. Those who were in town all day had their absorbing occupations. Those who went away by train in the morning and returned at night, were not much impressed by the appearance of the village, neat or otherwise. The women, at home through the day, decided that there must be town improvements, so they formed themselves into an association, and presto! the town was shorn of its ugliness, and put on so great an air of elegance and thrift that property values were perceptibly increased.

Women are busy in a hundred ways now were once they had but a single way of using their energies. Especially this is true of women in middle life, or elderly women, whose experience makes them fit advisers, and who have earned a little leisure from domestic cares.

How to Strengthen Memory

Memory is a sieve if you let it serve you badly; but, forced to do its work well, it will retain whatever is intrusted to its care.

When you find yourself at a loss to remember a name or a date, or to fix the time accurately even any family event happened, do not say resignedly, Oh, I am growing old. I am losing my memory. On the contrary, sit down and resolve that you will remember. Fix your will power on that one thing. By the process of unconscious cerebration, before very long the brain will produce the impression you want.

Inconsequent people are inconvenienced by their lack of ability to recollect things in detail, but they need not be. They must summon the slave attention, and he will in turn cause the delinquent memory.

There are more memories than one, in us all. Thus, one woman has no difficulty in placing her kith and kin to the remotest cousin, but she cannot tell you the minister's text last Sunday. Another can give in fullest outline the itinerary of a journey, but it would puzzle her to recite a rule in grammar or a page of history.

Memory is strengthened by use. The more it has to carry the greater will be its capacity for delivering parcels on application. But if you prefer to commit important matters to memoranda, why, do that. A note-book in the pocket, an

THE ORIENTAL TASTE IN GARDENING

From the Far East, we get some beautiful object lessons in the picturesque arrangement of gardens. Especially are the Japanese famous for what may be called success in miniature effects. They love flowers, and cultivate them as only flower-lovers do, and their tea-gardens, of which many are now found in our own California, are marvels of beauty and tasteful display.

A JAPANESE SUMMER BOWER IN CALIFORNIA

engagement calendar on the desk, a pencil and card in the purse, may be valuable adjuncts to memory. For the railway train, consult the latest time-table rather than the most trustworthy memory.

A verse or two memorized "by heart" daily will fill your mind with wealth that you may draw upon at pleasure. The late gifted Dr. Maltbie Babcock never permitted a day to pass in which he did not memorize a hundred lines of poetry.

Orphanages and their Claim

ORPHANED children have a claim on those who possess homes. The word "claim" is purposely chosen. When God removes parents, and leaves a callow brood at the mercy of the storm, he does not mean that it shall perish. Society gathers such little ones into asylums, where they are clothed, fed, and taught, and where they receive the initial training for good citizenship. But all over our great country there are families into which an orphan child could be adopted, brought up with the home children as one of them, or made the joy of childless people. Of course there is often the doubt how an orphan will turn out. Those who believe very strongly in heredity fear that the child they might adopt might develop some undesirable trait or feature, and that they would be sorry for their investment of love and self-denial in some future day.

It sometimes happens that people's own children, surrounded from babyhood with the best influences, and descended from godly stock, turn out very ill indeed, so that it is hardly fair to fancy that orphans may necessarily prove a disappointment. A careful investigation shows that numerous instances of adoption have been renumerate in the highest degree; the sons and daughters by adoption equalling in gratitude, appreciation, and nobility of character, the sons and daughters of the home itself.

"I want to adopt a little one," said a sweet, motherly woman, to whom God had given no child. "I shall look for the most friendless little waif I can find, and, God helping me, give her the best that a Christian household can offer in Christian training and education."

She did this, and in her age she was ministered to by a daughter whom a queen might have been proud to acknowledge. The waif became a woman of much distinction of manner, and of rare fineness of spirit.

Consider the claim on you, my friend, wherever you may be, of the orphan children of this land, and remember the orphans of other lands. In India, in Macedonia, in China. There are orphans whose call on the Christian world cannot be dismissed. A small yearly contribution supports an orphan in the Eastern world, and prepares him or her for a career of usefulness hereafter, and redeems from the bondage of heathenism one who may be a bright star in our Saviour's diadem.

A Day in Bed

To spend a day in bed when one is not ill, seems at first mention rather a waste of time, yet there is profit in it for a tired woman. Spring fever, that languor and listlessness which make endeavor wearisome, and that tendency to nervous irritability which is often felt when the tension of winter is over, may be combated by rich women without much trouble. They have only to take a steamer for a trip to some bright Southern coast or island, or to step on board a train and exchange one climate for another, or if they choose, they may visit the Old World. It is for them a question of the purse only or chiefly.

The large majority of women, who must study economy very closely, cannot change the scene at will. For them the rest must be secured at home.

Every one knows that the sequence of a brief illness is often a great gain in strength. This is because the patient has had the rest afforded by staying for a short period in bed. Just one day every week or every fortnight thus passed by a tired woman, who is only tired, not really ill, will prove very profitable to her. Try it. Let yourself be waited on, and a little missed, down-stairs. In the end you will find the spring fever routed.

A Note of Sympathy

Whether a note of sympathy be written when congratulations or condolences are to be uttered, it should be simple, direct and to the point. No long introduction is needed. The letter must be from heart to heart. People sometimes hesitate about sending formal messages either of affectionate felicitation on a wedding or a birth, or of loving sorrow on the occasion of a misfortune or a bereavement. They fear they may not say the right thing in the right way.

But, as a rule, the hesitation is needless. A letter is an expression of sentiment, and the more personal it is, the better it meets its end. The mistake would be to use stilted or exaggerated language, to drop into fine writing, to put on a manner in your letter different from your usual manner.

Grateful Macedonian Refugees

PASTOR POPOFF CONTINUES THE STORY OF HIS TOUR
AMONG THE MOUNTAIN VILLAGES

A REFUGEE MOTHER

IN a letter dated at Lujene, Feb. 8, Pastor Popoff, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's Special Commissioner among the Macedonian refugees, gives further interesting details of his journey among the fugitives, who are scattered through the mountain villages on the Bulgarian border. He writes:

From Ichtiman I started for Lujene. To reach this place I rode only one hour by rail and nine hours by carriage, over mountain roads. Lujene is the principal of three villages in the Rodope mountains, about four hours' journey from the boundary line between Bulgaria and Macedonia. The three villages are nestled in a beautiful mountain dale; the three together having a population of five thousand, which derives subsistence from the forest mostly, by cutting and drawing firewood and lumber.

The three villages—Lujene, Chepinska Banga, and Kamenitza, are only fifteen to twenty minutes walk apart. There are one thousand refugees in these three villages, divided as follows: in Lujene, one hundred families; in Chepinska Banga, one hundred and ten families, and in Kamenitza, fourteen families. The Central Macedonia Relief Committee of Sofia had been providing food for them; but of late, for lack of means, the Committee gives them only a loaf of black bread, weighing about two pounds per day. Some clothing has been distributed by various relief agencies. From the funds sent to Dr. Clarke, in Samokov, $234.10 have been distributed in these villages. The following articles were purchased and distributed: 810 yards of cloth for underwear; 62 blankets; 57 waists, cut but not sewed; 116 pairs of sandals; 160 kerchiefs for head covering; 33 foot wraps; also trousers, and coarse cloth for mending their stockings. I found some families living in stables with the cattle. Among the refugees in Lujene are about forty protestants from Razlog. Rev. Mr. Sedloeff, their pastor, is himself a refugee. He is THE CHRISTIAN HERALD representative there. I preached to them Sunday morning from the text, "Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil; for thou art with me;" Psalm 23:4. In the afternoon, about one hundred and fifty people came to the hotel to hear from me what America is doing for them. After my talk, an old man said to me: "We are very grateful for the aid given us, but we will be more grateful if something will be done that will enable us to go to our own places, although our homes are destroyed."

Refugees from Macedonia began to reach Philippopolis in November last. They came principally from Kovachevtze and Obidein, two devastated villages. They came also from Adrianople vilayet and other sections. They were kindly received and sheltered, and the municipal government appropriated 400 francs for their support. This was supplemented by gifts from private sources. Ultimately a relief committee was organized, with Mr. Mileff as President, and active work was soon under way, settling and taking care of the refugees. Thus, without outside aid, the refugees in Philippopolis have been well cared for. They were distributed in small groups among the surrounding villages, and local sub-committees were appointed to look after their interests. Now, however, the native resources have become exhausted, and outside help will be welcomed.

Pastor Popoff also visited Stanimaka, a city of 15,000 population, at the foot of the Rhodope Mountains. He writes:

"In the Stanimaka district, there are 800 refugees distributed in the thirteen villages and in several monasteries. I found an active local relief committee, the refugees well taken care of. They are provided with lodgings and food by the villagers and the monasteries. I visited two of the monasteries, Bachkovsky and Sveta Petka. In the former there are eighty refugees, and in the latter thirty-five. Those at the Bachkovsky Monastery are all from Kovachevtzi. About $200 can at once be used in the Stanimaka district for clothing. Some blankets were distributed from the 10,000 francs donated by the King of Italy. Some of the men were in need of trousers, and so they cut up the blankets and converted them into trousers."

Three refugee girls came from Kremen, a village of the Nevrekop district. Kremen was destroyed by the Turks on the 15th of September last—not one house being left. The people fled to Bulgaria, being quartered in Tatar Pazardjik and surrounding villages. I saw the three orphan girls in Tatar Pazardjik and heard their sad tale from their own lips, and from their uncle. The oldest, Yana (Ann), is eighteen, Kalina is fourteen, and Maria, seven. Their father, Ilia Ilipovsky, was the wealthiest man of the village. As Kmet (mayor) of the village, when the Turkish soldiers and Bashi-bazouks, after setting fire to a number of surrounding villages, were coming upon Kremen, and the population was all in confusion and preparing to flee, Ilipovsky tried to persuade the people to remain quiet, urging that nothing would happen to them, telling them that he would go out to meet the Turks and would persuade them to do no harm to the village. Many times before he had averted similar danger. With two other men, Stoyan Usheff and Ilia Usheff, he went about two miles out of the city to meet the Turks.

Not far from the village, the Turks commenced their diabolical work. First they drove slivers under the finger-nails of the three men. Not succeeding in drawing from them any acknowledgment of revolutionary movements in the village, they next plucked out their eyes, baked the victims alive on a fire, and finally pierced them with their bayonets until death ensued.

The wife of the Kmet started off with her two boys, hoping to meet her husband. One of the boys, frightened at the sight of the Turks, fled toward the forest, where he was afterward found and taken to Nevrokop. A bullet from a Turk's rifle pierced the other boy, and when the mother protested she herself became a victim.

my brother; for we are God-fearing men, and becomes not a God-fearing man to repel evil with evil, nor to strike one who is prostrated, nor to destroy his enemy unto death. And now, put the sword into its place, and come and help me, and we will cure him from his wound, and if he lives he shall be our friend, and his father Pharaoh shall be our father." Then Levi lifted the son of Pharaoh from the ground, and washed the blood from his mouth, and bound a bandage over his wound, and put him on his horse and brought him to his father, Pharaoh, telling him all that had happened. And Pharaoh, rising up from his throne, bowed before Levi to the ground, and blessed him.

of the stone with which he had been wounded by Benjamin. And Pharaoh mourned much for his first-born son, on which account Pharaoh became sick and died, and he was one hundred and nine years old, and he left his diadem to Joseph.

Joseph ruled in Egypt forty and eight years, and after this, Joseph gave the crown to Pharaoh's younger son, who was a child when Pharaoh's oldest son died.

And Joseph was like a father to Pharaoh's youngest son in the land of Egypt, where he dwelt with Asenath, his wife, praising and speaking of God unto the day of his death.

Bought by Children's Pennies

The junk shown in the accompanying illustration, with its big mat sail and Chinese crew, has quite an interesting history. It is the property of the London Missionary Society, whose operations are almost exclusively confined to various groups of the South Sea Islands and the interior of China. Contributions from the Sunday-Schools, and pennies from the children, were raised for the purpose of providing various mission stations with small wattle and daub huts, and small portable steamers for the lakes and rivers. The junk was provided by the pennies of the Mill Hill School, and is now at work carrying the Gospel round about the Chung King Missions, in China. It is nothing more or less than a floating school, for the evangelists live on board, and about them does all the necessary cooking in the tiny cabin. A copy of this photograph was distributed to each boy and girl who contributed towards the boat. Not the least interesting part of the stock carried by this floating church, is the large set of pictures, whereby preaching is done in many cases. Picture-preaching is much resorted to by European missionaries in China, who have not mastered the extraordinarily difficult characters of the Chinese language.

The Best of all Bibles

The Red Letter Bible received. I have examined it carefully, and I can honestly say that it is the best of any Bible I ever saw, no matter what the price was. I have purchased several reference Bibles for gifts, during the past few years, advertised by the different firms, or sent out by newspapers. I have looked over Bible depositories and book-stores, besides consulting many catalogues; so you see either your offer is a most excellent book, or I am very particular—possibly a little of both. To many people, a Bible is Bible; not so with the earnest up-to-date Bible student, he wants the best—the greatest time saver; good clear print, etc. I feel that I have all this, thanks to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Shall be pleased to show it to my friends. MRS. E. J. PARMELIE, Wausburg Falls, Vermont.

The "Oldest Inhabitant" Gone

THERE passed away lately, in Piscataway Township, N. J., Noah Raby, who is believed by many to have been the oldest man in the United States, if not the oldest in the world. According to his own statement, had he lived to April 1, he would have been 132 years old. Although blind, shrivelled, and shrunken, and with hardly any life in him, he retained his memory until a few months ago. "Uncle Noah," when he told the story of his life to visitors, gave the Gates County Court House, at Eatontown, N. C., as his birthplace, and said his father was an Indian and his mother a white. He never attended school. He learned to read a little, but never to write. When he was seven years old he was apprenticed to a farmer, and stayed with him until he was twenty-one. Then he became a hired man on the farm of "Widow" Penelope Parker, in his home county. Noah served on board the old frigate Constitution, and afterward on the Brandywine. He got out before the war of 1812 began. The event that had impressed itself most firmly on his memory, was the speech of George Washington, that he once heard. Noah was never married.

Called Higher

Mrs. L. V. Wolf, of Clarksburg, W. Va., passed away lately. She was a bright and exemplary Christian, and greatly beloved and respected in the community. She had long been a reader of this journal.

Mr. Charles Farnsworth, who died recently at the ripe age of eighty-two, was born in Groton, Mass., in 1822. He was a member of the Baptist Church for thirty years, and was a consistent and active Christian, greatly beloved by all who knew him. His widow survives him.

Captain Havens, the last of the "whaling captains" of Sag Harbor, N. Y., passed away on Feb. 18, in his eighty-ninth year. He was the oldest member of the Sag Harbor Presbyterian Church, and for many years was a reader of this journal. Not long ago, his pastor, calling on him, asked, "How are your spiritual prospects, Captain?" "My sails are all set, there's a fair wind, and soon I'll enter the haven of rest," was the smiling reply of the aged Christian. He was greatly beloved and respected, and his funeral was very largely attended.

CONFIDENCE

SO dark the clouds around my way—
I cannot see;
But through the darkness I believe
God leadeth me.
I gladly place my hand in his
When all is dim—
And closing then my weary eyes,
Lean hard on him.

Through thorny pathways, he may lead
My tired feet—
Through hours of grief when teardrops flow,
But it is sweet
To know that he is close to me,
My friend and guide;
So while he leads me, I will walk
Quite satisfied.

To my blind eyes he may reveal
No light at all—
But while I lean on his strong arm
I cannot fall.
So, trusting him, I trudge along
Life's weary way,
Content to think that soon will dawn
A brighter day.

African Savages Hear the Gospel

MRS. ALLEN'S MISSIONARY WORK AMONG THE NATIVES OF NANNA KROO — AN EXCITING EXPERIENCE

AFTER five years of uninterrupted missionary work on the west coast of Africa, among the Kroos, Mrs. Mary L. Allen has returned to her native land. In an interview with the writer, she gave many interesting instances of what had been accomplished among this savage people, in the effort to give them the Gospel.

From Nanna Kroo (which signifies "town or coast of the Kroos"), four different missionaries had been successively driven away. Mrs. Allen succeeded in winning the confidence of the people, and was permitted to stay.

"I was sent down the coast to Nanna Kroos, by the brother of a chief," said Mrs. Allen, "as his stranger or guest, and being a 'fetish' man or priest, he gave me all the protection I needed. These savages worship the devil, or spirit of evil, as we worship God as the Spirit of all Good. They think that by worship and sacrifice, they can appease this devil-god's wrath, and make friends with him, so that he will not harm them. They worship cats, and offer them as sacrifice to this evil god. They have a certain quick intelligence, and I did not find much difficulty in beginning my work. They love everything white. Their language is simple, their vocabulary being very meagre, I soon learned enough to convey the first ideas I wished to present. I made a white heart upon the blackboard, and told them how all their hearts might become pure and white. The men and boys are far more susceptible to the religious teaching than the women.

One boy in particular, Mrs. Allen spoke of with much pride. He was the son of the priest under whose protection she had come to the town, as their settlement of huts is called. This boy in two years, had so far mastered the English language, that he had read the Bible through once and the New Testament three times, and had committed to memory many books of the latter entire, besides the whole book of Psalms.

At Mrs. Allen's home, which was nothing but a thatched hut, she taught from twenty to forty natives; patiently, day by day, trying to instill into them the first principles of truth and goodness. It was hard, up-hill work; but she persevered, doing her best all alone. She had not been sent out by any missionary board and her work was an independent one, trusting to faith and prayer for support. She witnessed some dreadful scenes during her sojourn at Nanna Kroos; where there was war and savage bloodshed! The bushmen came from the interior and attacked the Kroos; because they thought they were not being fairly treated by the latter, who act as middlemen in disposing of the bushmen's produce to the traders at the posts, and on the coast. This produce consists mainly of palm oil, nuts and bamboo fibre. Notwithstanding the awful scenes of bloodshed that had occurred, the brave little woman did not desert her post. Her faith in divine protection was justified, and her home became a house of refuge for the savage Queen of the Kroos, who fled to her for safety during the thick of the fight.

Mrs. Allen witnessed no actual cannibalism; but the bodies of the slain bushmen were chopped into small pieces, and distributed among the victors. These dismembered remnants were distributed as trophies of victory in the various towns.

Liberian troops were sent down to support the coast town, and Mrs. Allen was strongly advised by the soldiers to leave, but she refused; and no doubt this brave conduct inspired her savage friends with an admiration and respect, which greatly helped her influence and her work.

Each Kroo man has as many wives as he can buy. The condition of the women and girls is most pitiable. Food being very scarce on account of a famine, many of the women and children were attracted to Mrs. Allen's mission, because she always gave them food when she had it. But there were times when she had none to give, and when hunger became a guest at her poor home. But she stayed on, keeping alive with nothing to eat but wild grass and a little rice.

As soon as she acquired enough of the native tongue to teach them English, the way was comparatively easy. She told them of a great Father, who would love and care for them, and who required no sacrifice of life and blood, such as they offered to their evil god.

One day, a "fetish" man called on her and she explained to him the Gospel. He listened attentively, but when he was told that it was required of him to give up all his wives but one (he had between thirty and forty), he went away offended, and hid himself to another part of the town, where he offered up a human sacrifice to the devil-god (a slave can be utilized at any time for such a purpose).

Mrs. Allen's purpose in coming home is twofold—first, to obtain a little rest, and second, to try and get together thirty or more negro families who will emigrate to Liberia, and settle there. She says that if trading posts could be established from Nanna Kroo, to the interior, among the bushmen, they could then deal directly with the traders, and these barbarous wars would be averted.

OUR X-RAY FOR INDIA'S LEPERS

DR. Alice Condict, the American Medical Missionary in India, who lately appeared through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, for an X-Ray machine for her work among the lepers of India, has enlisted the sympathy of a number of our readers in her humane project. Several have sent contributions to be applied toward the purchase of the X-Ray machine. All contributions for this worthy purpose will be acknowledged in these columns.

A Subscriber in Ellsworth, Wis. ($1), writes:

I cannot let the appeal go by unanswered. It isn't much that I can give toward it, but I pray that God will bless it many times over, and bring the help that they need.

D. B. R., Sumneytown, Pa. ($1), writes:

For part payment for the X-Ray machine which Dr. Condict is praying for. Had I the means that some men have, God only knows that I would pay for the whole machine.

A Friend, Pendleton, Ga. ($2), writes:

May our dear Lord bless the undertaking.

Miss Lena K., Dublin, Texas ($1), writes:

I hope this will be among the first of the $500 to buy an X-Ray machine for Dr. Condict of India. May God bless this move to the relief of many of India's sufferers and the salvation of many souls.

M. M. F., North Woburn, Mass. ($5), writes:

I believe that with God's blessing, the machine will be the means of accomplishing much good.

SOMEBODY SAID THE OTHER DAY that the method of the CENTURY CLUB was

"Life-Insurance Set to Music"

It certainly IS a happy proposition,—sensible, economical, convenient and profitable to every member.

Nothing so interesting and attractive has hitherto been seen or dreamed of in the insurance world.

Each membership carries with it a modern policy for $1,000 or more, in one of the strong and dependable old-line Companies on small monthly instalments, instead of "all cash down." This makes it easy to start, and that's what we're all looking for.

Besides, each member may enjoy an immediate increase of income through the use of the Club's NEIGHBORHOOD PLAN, and that, too, is interesting.

HOW TO JOIN

Write at once for particulars, which will be promptly mailed you. In order that you may receive complete and personal information concerning the exceptional advantages afforded by the CLUB plan, please do not fail to answer the two following questions in your first letter.

1st. What is your occupation?

2d. What is the exact date of your birth?

This will enable the CLUB to make you a very definite proposition. Otherwise it can't Address

ANSWERED PRAYERS

R. M. L. B. "I wish to add my testimony to the many answers of prayer. A number of times has the dear Father answered prayers for me, in such a plain way, that I could not but know that it was an answer to earnest prayer, for which I praise his holy name."

Mrs. S. W., Ill. "I received a great deal of blessing through the columns of 'Answered Prayers.' I can testify that God has answered many of my prayers."

A Reader. "The Lord answered a prayer for me when in great trouble, as he has done before. I thank and praise and bless him."

D. M. G., Ann Arbor. "Having read the columns of Answered Prayers in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, I want to publicly acknowledge my thankfulness to God for answered prayer. Praise his holy name!"

G. S. B., Brooklyn, N. Y. "I know God answers prayer. Many times has he heard and answered me. If there is trouble anywhere, I always take it to the Lord in prayer, and he never fails to hear and answer. All praise to his name."

R. B. L. (husband and wife), Ohio. "We wish to express our thankfulness to God for answering our prayers."

E. J. B., New Hampshire. "Several months ago I promised the dear Lord if he would free my father of a certain trouble, I would let the public know it. My prayer was answered, and I cannot thank him enough for it."

Mrs. T. E. McK. "I have hesitated a long time saying anything about answered prayers; but I have had so many answered, that I felt as though I ought to testify. If we only come to our Father and tell him of our troubles, and ask him in faith, believing, he will surely listen."

D. M., Illinois. "I promised the Lord that if my prayer was answered I would openly acknowledge it. I ask the prayers of God's children who read this, for the conversion of my husband and children."

Mrs. L. K., White Plains. "I wish to give thanks and praise to the Master for all of his care over me, through my long life."

Reader. "Only an armor-bearer, I wish to acknowledge the goodness and mercy and power of God in answering my prayer. With him all things are possible—nothing too difficult for him to perform."

Acknowledgments of answers to prayers have also been received from Lena A., Ionia, Mich.; N. L. G., Ironton, O.; Teresa S., Baltimore; Reader, New York; Mrs. M. E. W., Kelso, Tenn.; Mrs. E. A Church 364 Years Old

Probably the oldest church edifice in the United States, is San Miguel Church, in Santa Fe, New Mexico, erected in 1540. It is to this day used for worship. In the rear of the church, covered with dust, is the old bell, even older than the church, brought from Spain, and containing gold and silver, the residue of precious ornaments, which, according to old custom, were thrown into the metal when the bell was cast.

Among the old paintings in the church, are those of "St. Michael and the Dragon," and of "The Annunciation," by old Spanish masters. J. F. B.

Victory Through Christ*

The Spiritual in Man Overcoming and Triumphing by Imparted Power

ALL life is a struggle. The more we learn of animal life and plant life, the clearer becomes the fact that the principles of human life, which we know from painful experience to be those of conflict, are in operation in the lower forms of life. Even there, obstacles have to be overcome, enemies must be vanquished and only by constant effort does the plant, or animal, or the man, attain growth and development. Where there is no life, there is no progress. The stone is a stone always and can be nothing but a stone, until a being endowed with life gives it shape and form and use. It is so with men. At the beginning of life we have the spiritual in animal form. We need our physical senses to receive impressions and to give expression to thought. They are capable of affording enjoyment and herein lies our danger. To use them for the purpose for which they were given, is to make progress; to live to gratify them and to have no pleasure but that derived from them, is to remain stationary, and even to decay.

The combination of the animal and the spiritual in man is a problem for every individual; he may become spiritual, or become merely animal, according as he cultivates one or the other of the component parts of his being. We are explicitly told that if we live after the flesh we shall die, but if we live after the spirit, we shall live on, as sons of God, when the body is laid aside in the grave. So, then, there is the alternative for every one, of rising or sinking in the scale of being. Comparatively few are capable of rising by unaided effort. The flesh is powerful and insistent and the easier course of yielding to it is seductive. It is here that reinforcement is needed and is provided. God sympathizes with the spiritual in its struggle and gives it help. This is why Christ came into the world. His life showed what human nature was capable of becoming, and his promise was that power should come from him to enable men to lead such lives. He that would accept that power, should win the victory over the flesh, the world and the grave.

Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God. They are useless there, because the spirit has its own means of expression when it emerges from the body. In one of Mrs. Alfred Gatty's beautiful Parables from Nature, she represents a butterfly as talking with a caterpillar, whom she installs as nurse for the brood that she expects from the eggs. The butterfly knows she is going to die, and she tells the caterpillar what food she is to give her children. They are to have the early dew and the honey from flowers, not the coarse cabbage leaves that the caterpillar eats. The caterpillar promises; but when the butterfly is dead and the eggs come to life, the caterpillar finds that they are not butterflies like their mother, as the mother thought they would be, but caterpillars like herself, who could not live on honey and dew, but must have the cabbage leaves. Only when they have died in the cocoon to the caterpillar life and have become butterflies, can they live on honey and dew. Then the cabbage leaves would be distasteful to them. So when the soul has left the body it enters into a new existence, in which the pleasures of sense are left behind.

The sting of death is sin. A sad house was that recently described in a New York daily paper. A mother, bereaved of her beautiful daughter, was walking up and down the corridors of her mansion, wringing her hands. A clergyman was trying to comfort her. "No," she replied, "I cannot accept such hope. My daughter was fond of balls and dress and the theatre. She lived for nothing else. She could not be happy in any other way. They ruined her. She became wicked, and I could not save her. I have no hope for her. Death has taken her, and what is left? If she had possessed any tastes or desires that could survive death, I might be comforted, but she had none."

Victory through Jesus Christ. The story is told of a merchant, who, during our Civil War, was sitting at his desk, when a man, wan and poorly dressed, entered his office and asked for help. He said that he had been in the army, but had caught severe cold in the trenches, rheumatism and other ailments had developed and he had been very ill. He had no friends, would the merchant help him? The merchant was a hard man, and he had listened to many such stories, and he refused. As the man went out he glanced at the name on the sign, and recognized it as the name of a comrade. That night he sat down and wrote to his comrade, describing his situation and his urgent need of help. Some time afterwards he made another call on the merchant, who remembered his former application and sternly reiterated his refusal of help. But the sick man, without a word, laid on the merchant's desk a letter. The merchant opened it and read, "The bearer saved my life in battle. Dear father, be good to him, for Charlie's sake." No more was needed. For Charlie's sake the man was cared for from that time.

Results of Prohibition

THERE is no reason why prohibitory law should not apply as well to a city as to a town, and it should be equally as stringently enforced in one place as in the other, writes Joseph Manley, in The World To-day. Some people will assert that it is impossible to enforce this law in the cities. This is not true, for there are several cities in Maine where liquor can not be purchased. No law can escape violation. Murder, arson and robbery will be committed, but we can enforce the prohibitory law just as well as we can enforce our laws against other crimes. We must not submit to the proposition that this law is right as a law, but should be enforced with discretion. Whenever the majority of the people desire to change a law, they can do so; but we have in Maine no evidence of any strong desire on the part of the people to change this law. On the contrary, there is abundant evidence that they desire it to be strictly enforced in every part of the State. The people of Maine, the majority of them, live quiet, home lives. They believe in the home and everything that pertains to law and order. They believe in having peaceful and happy communities. They believe in the enforcement of the prohibitory law. The people are sovereigns and have the power in their own hands. Every attempt that is made to repeal or nullify this law is in the interest of disorder and crime, and should be and will be suppressed. The Republican party of Maine has always proclaimed itself in favor of this law and in favor of its strict enforcement. It is not believed that, at the instigation of the saloon owner or the frequenter of the saloon, they are intending to disavow their former declarations and come out in favor of license. We assert that we have the right to favor a prohibitory law for ourselves. We have the right to enforce it; and it has stood upon our statute books for over half a century.

Ward Option in Chicago

A petition to the City Council of Chicago, asking for the passage of an ordinance providing for Ward Option on the saloon question, is being vigorously circulated by representatives of at least one hundred and fifty churches of various denominations in Chicago. The Young People's Christian Temperance Union is responsible for the movement. The campaign is splendidly organized. Each one of the one hundred picked workers has a corps of assistants under him. Probably twelve hundred young people are at work.

EASTER THOUGHTS

The Import of Christ's Resurrection

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

IT was the first day of the week. There never had been such a first day. It was a new beginning for humanity under a new head. The curse for the sin of the old Adam had been borne, the punishment for the world's sin had been executed. One, the One who alone could, had stood in the breach as the Lamb of God, and had borne our sins in his own body to the tree (I. Peter 2: 24), and had become the propitiation for the sins of the whole world (I. John 2: 2), having tasted death for every man.

And now, "Christ being risen from the dead, dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over him" (Rom. 5: 9). It was a new day when Christ arose from the grave. He had proved in his life on earth that a human being, filled with the Spirit of God, can live a sinless life, and thus the power of sin was broken, and he made the way through. And he took his life again, and proved that the power of death is broken through; he also has made the way. And he has become the head of a company—a body of men who are risen with Christ, identified with him.

The day of Christ's resurrection is the beginning of days to the true Church of Christ, which is his body (Eph. 1: 22, 23). Men may make us members of external churches, but God alone can bring about the mighty change which makes us personally to know ourselves crucified and risen with Christ by a living faith, created in us by the Holy Spirit, in the Word of God, which teaches us this great truth. It is not enough simply to believe that Christ died for us, and that our sins are therefore forgiven. Thank God indeed that this is blessedly true. But this is only a part of the truth, and this part does not set us free from the power of sin. But if indeed we are identified with Christ, then we see glorious possibilities opening before us. What has been possible to him in a human life may be, can be, as I abide in him, possible also to me. The great matter is to abide in him. This is the great "fight of faith." Satan is ever seeking to occupy us with ourselves, with what we are, with comparisons between ourselves and others, with our badness or our goodness, etc., while our real place is on the cross where we have died, and at the same time on the throne to which, in him, we have ascended. On the cross, as far as self is concerned, on the throne as regards the life our Lord shares with us. This is real Easter, this is a life risen with Christ, out of which springs a life of power and blessing; and it is only to be had as we abide and continue abiding in Christ; denying, ignoring ourselves, but acknowledging him, filled with his Spirit.

It was the first day of the week. The last days of the week which was gone had seen the Son of God insulted, mocked, forsaken of those who knew him best, crucified, laying down his life, buried. All the hopes in him that he should be the Messiah for whom the Jews were looking, had been rudely disappointed. His disciples were perplexed, in despair. Clinging still to their own view of things, his words about his resurrection brought no comfort to them. But there was one who had perceived them. "After three days I will rise again," had laid hold on the heart of one who had come to the end of all hope in herself, and Jesus had cast out of her seven devils. Mary had counted the days; the third day was about to dawn, and, not waiting like the other women for sunrise, she "came to the sepulchre while it was yet dark." There was only light enough to perceive that something had happened—the stone which had been sealed by the authorities, who also set a watch to guard it, had been removed, and the guard was gone too.

What were the thoughts in Mary's heart as she saw this? Had some premonition of what she saw occurred to her? Did she think the keepers had acted treacherously, or did the words of Jesus ring in her ears, "After three days I will rise again" (Matt. 27: 63)? She ran quickly for Peter and John, telling them, "They have taken away the Lord out of the sepulchre, and we know not where they have laid him." Neither she nor they, as yet, understood the resurrection.

WOOING AND WEDDING IN COREA

WOOING in the "Land of the Morning Calm," as Corea is called by the natives, consists in certain negotiations between the two prospective fathers-in-law, who are in some instances assisted by a middleman, or marriage-broker. The young woman who is most interested has nothing whatever to say or do in the matter, and her future are disposed of to the best advantage of her family—a proceeding in which she acquiesces without a protest or murmur. She has no choice in the matter, and if she were given one, she would be very at sea, because, since she reached the age of eight years, she never has willingly looked on the face of boy or man.

Corean girls are told that it is disgraceful even to be seen by the other sex, so that they hide themselves whenever anyone appears. There is no family life, as we know it, because such customs, begun in childhood and continued to old age and death, leave no chance for such relations. Among the higher classes, while the man and his wife live under the same roof, their apartments are separate. The men of the family chat, smoke, and enjoy themselves in the outer rooms, while the women chatter and gossip among themselves in the inner apartments.

When a young Corean girl arrives at marriageable age, no relative even, except those of the very nearest of kin, is allowed to see her, and these must address her with a most ceremonious reserve, and while the wooing of the fathers-in-law is in progress, the girl begins to contemplate her future hairdressing, when she, according to custom, will change her maiden coiffure to that of a married woman.

The fathers of the young people having been in communication, either personally or by letter (negotiations having previously been opened by a marriage-broker or middleman), proceed with preparations for the wedding (the tastes or characters of the principals are never consulted), and a favorable day is appointed.

One other important factor must not be overlooked, and that is the consultation of an astrologer, who really appoints the day. The age of the groom is added to that of the bride, and the star at rules the destiny of the two in one, is the star whose day is chosen for the wedding. If this is omitted, it is believed that misfortune of one kind or another will surely overtake a couple so inauspiciously joined. While such a marriage seems to our ideas utterly devoid of all that would make it important or attractive to the girl, it is a great event in a young man's life, for, less he is married, a man has no civil rank or influence. No unmarried man is supposed to be capable of thinking or acting seriously, and he is treated accordingly. He can take no part in social or civic affairs, and marriage is his only emancipation. Until he is married he has no right to speak among men, or wear a hat. Judging by the size of these head coverings, which are like ornamented umbrellas, the matter of wearing or not wearing one must be of great importance.

The badge of single or married life is the manner of wearing the hair. A young unmarried man goes bare-headed, with a single tress of hair hanging down his back. After he is married, the hair is tied in a knot, and bound on top of his head. The nuptial tie, a knot of hair!

The women are very careful of their shiny black tresses, and often add false braids and switches to make their coiffures of sufficient bulk (this custom, however, is not confined strictly to women of Corea). They make up two large tresses which are rolled to the back and top of the head, and there secured by long silver or ceremony. A certain form is mumbled by the man and woman, which is repeated thrice, as the couple bow each to the other. Then the bride lifts her veil! For the first time the man sees what manner of woman he has married. To the stolid Oriental this moment may be fraught with but a passing and unimportant curiosity, what it would mean to the ordinary man of Western heredity can be better imagined than described.

Etiquette, among the nobility, require that the bride must preserve absolute silence upon her nuptial day. She must be as mute and impassive as a statue, though overwhelmed with questions and compliments.

If rich, the bride goes to her home in a palanquin, if poor, she rides on horseback; all, rich or poor, wear a cap or veil, with ornaments on breast, back and at the girdle. Before this home-going certain ceremonies are gone through with. A symbolic figure at a wedding is a goose, which among Coreans is the emblem of fidelity. Sometimes it is a live bird, brought in in a cloth, and sometimes it is a figure made of gilded wood. There are other emblems in fantastic shapes of straw, which are presented to both bride and groom. A gourd-bottle of rice wine is handed to the bride by the groom. Some of the wine is poured out by the bridesmaid standing beside the couple, who pass and exchange the one little "cup of the wine of mutual joy." This cup is filled and emptied several times.

Then begins the wedding feast, when everyone makes merry. A document called the hou-se-chi is signed by both parties. Sometimes the bride is unable to write, she then spreads out her hand, tracing its outline upon the paper; she thus gives her hand upon it. Then the bridegroom gives to his father-in-law a written oath of constancy to his daughter. This, however, seems an unnecessary and superfluous form, as the "hermit nation" never requires faithfulness of this kind from the men, it being looked upon as a typical female virtue, and not at all obligatory upon the other sex. The ideal wife for a Corean is one who submits in all things, regarding herself as of an inferior race, with no idea of progress or the slightest infraction of established usage. And the Corean is seldom disappointed. Although there have been instances where a woman of superior tact and intelligence has made herself respected by her husband and family.

The general type of costume is that of China, under a very ancient dynasty, and so a Corean looks rather antiquated, a curiosity in old clothes, to a Chinaman, while to an American a Corean swell seems to be a compound of night and undergarments.

Both sexes wear an undergarment like a short jacket with sleeves, with trousers loose to the ankle. Women wear a petticoat over this garment, and so the Corean women believe that they dress like the Western women. Over the petticoat is worn a wrapper, wide, and in summer, stiff with starch, clinging and baggy in cold weather. In this day of no pockets and the omnipresent copper pins. The common people braid and roll the braids around the head like a turban.

On the evening before the wedding the bride-to-be invites one of her friends to make the desired change in her hair-dressing, and the bridegroom also invites an intimate friend to "do up" his hair in real manly style. These persons are chosen with the greatest care, as this changing hair marks the turning point in life, and the hair-dresser is called the "hand of honor."

On the wedding-day, the bridegroom and his family repair to the home of the bride's father, where a platform is set up and richly adorned with decorative woven stuffs. Friends and acquaintances assemble in a crowd, the bride and groom are brought in and take their places upon the platform, facing each other.

The bride enters veiled, and so remains during the

EASTER'S AFTERGLOW

The Law of Resurrection: A Sermon by Rev. F. W. GUNSAULUS, D. D.*

THE Christian man experiences the Christian religion and its growing process of redemption, in experiencing Christ. Christ is born into us in a manger, and the good that saves us, lives the entire life of Jesus over again in our soul. So we are not amazed at the episodes in the life of Christ which indicate the Law of Resurrection. The Apostle Peter clearly intimates that the power by which Jesus rose from the dead, was not a new or strange power at the Resurrection. Jesus, himself, told his disciples at the hour when he was transfigured before them, that they must not speak of what they had seen, "save when the Son of Man should be risen from the dead." And here is Peter preaching the Gospel of the Resurrection, or writing of it out of the fulness of his recollection of the holy Mount of Transfiguration. At the Transfiguration, Moses and Elias spoke to him about death, only as the "exodus which he should accomplish at Jerusalem." The death of Jesus, then, issuing as it did in life, on that Easter morning, was an achievement wrought out according to the law of his life, which involved both the Transfiguration and Resurrection. In order to study this law wisely, let us first look at the Transfiguration as containing a prophecy of the final and complete outworking of those forces which were supreme in the Resurrection. The power of one is that of the other. As he experienced them so may we, if we are Christ's own.

Hermon's Prophecy

Uncertain as it must ever be, the place of the Transfiguration of Jesus Christ in the unnamed holy land of the spiritual life is more sure. Let us enter the Soul's realm, now. The mountain-height of experience, on which naturally such an issuing forth of the Infinite through the finite ever occurs, is a result from the operation of forces, of which the strata of the spiritual world preserves the record. As a physical relationship appears to the geologist between Sinai, Hermon, and Calvary, so a spiritual relationship appears to the psychologist between seemingly isolated points in the experience of the human soul. They may be described as uplifts from the level plain of consciousness, made by the action of resistless spiritual energies. As actual, to the true soul, are the facts of the ideal as are those of what we call the real world. No exhaustive catalogue of distances which separate them, or of relationships which bind them, has been made; yet they act and react throughout the universe. Christ's whole life showed with what innate sovereignty they move on. And here we find that same unity of life with which his nature dominated his career, uniting each of these facts into one, so that, whatever doubt there may be in our geography of the seen world, there can be none in that of the unseen, as to where the Transfiguration—the flash of the unseen glory through the seen humiliation—did, and ever must occur.

Christ's mastery of nature was sympathetic and sublime. As a dreamer only, he might have climbed up the mountainside, so that he could have moments such as were Wordsworth's, of which the poet of "Rydal Mount" has said:

Oft, in these moments, such a holy calm
Would overspread my soul that bodily eyes
Were entirely forgotten, and what I saw Appeared like something in myself, a dream,
A prospect of the mind.

But the attitude of the Christ toward nature was not that of a listener for its secret. He himself was and is its secret. In that "presence which disturbs" the beholder,

With the joy
Of elevated thoughts: a sense sublime
Of something far more deeply interfused,
Whose dwelling is the light of setting suns,
And the round ocean, and the living air,
And the blue sky, and in the mind of man,
A motion and a spirit that impels
All thinking things, all objects of all thoughts,
And rolls through all things, it was his to feel the thrill of a pre-existent life—a life which was his before the worlds were created. He was conscious, on earth, of the hour in eternity, when, by him, the worlds were framed, and when the Word which in the beginning was with God, as it was God. As "the Word made flesh," it was his to see and illuminate nature in the light of himself.

That mountain where the physical was struck through with the spiritual in transfigured flesh, marked a world-pain, and recorded a moment in nature when, and a place where, the two lines of God's manifestation, in Creation and Incarnation, were approaching each other, though with agony which tore the planet in its travail. "The whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain until now" (Rom. 8: 22)—this was the fact beneath Hermon's white-crowned magnificence. This was the history, also, of Jesus, the Christ.

* From the texts, Acts 2: 24 "Whom God hath raised up;" II. Peter 1: 18, "This voice which came from heaven we heard;" Phil. 3: 10, "The power of his resurrection."

In all these moments, the Son of God was also the Son of Man. In the development of his self-consciousness, from a child, these conceptions had ever gone together. A heavenly and earthly companionship was his. On the one side, there was the infinite love; on the other, the loveless race of men. These he was to reconcile. As his soul grew receptive and intelligent of the divine love, he felt more keenly the woe of human sin. It was the gathering meaning of these two apparently opposed facts to him, that led him to take Peter, James and John with him. As the one heavenly fact broke with its inherent glory, he would have the other earthly fact blessed by its radiance.

Redemption Begun

"And as he prayed, the fashion of his countenance was altered, and his face did shine as the sun, and his raiment was white and glistening" (Luke 9: 29). Wonderful prayer to produce such wonderful results!

Christ Jesus began on Hermon, in himself, what has been rightly called the rehabilitation of man. There full redemption began to appear. Humanity saw him as its "Living Head." Life is transfigured, if the Transfigured One is Saviour and Lord of the whole being. Not alone in the Resurrection, but in this earlier event preceding the complete transformation, which is the glorification of man's earthly life in Christ, are our "bodies members of Christ." "From glory unto glory,"—this is the line of advance and its method. "This corruptible must put on incorruption, this mortal must put on immortality" (I. Cor. 15: 53). First, in the transfiguration of our whole life, there must begin the process. It completes itself, when the graves open.

The transfiguration of the human body of Jesus Christ was, therefore, an event in which all creation had a definite and unique illumination. The whole past of creation was lit up, and at least partially explained. With possibilities in Christ, as the Logos of creation, such as these, every farthest atom had quivered and advanced from the beginning. All natural forces from the first were striving with high energy to this and the greater event beyond it. Here he carries into the loftier jurisdiction of his personal life only the laws which lie in the bursting seed and the falling star.

The earth is crammed with heaven,
And every common bush afire with God.

In the Christ was the point where that flame quivered for a moment, and nature confessed in his transfiguration her kinship with the supernatural.

This fulfilling fact was Christ, whose face shone, and who then began anew the career of an eternal prophet. He was all this because he was the Saviour of the human soul from its sins. The presence of Elias, departing only after he had conversed with him concerning "the exodus which he should accomplish at Jerusalem," was in harmony with the relations of the death of Christ to the feelings of the soul, as expressed in all prophecy. To complete this work of redemption, this new prophet of humanity to whom the past surrendered, as its great figures disappeared, was to found a race of prophets whose lives should be lived by the law of his life—self-sacrifice—and the secret of whose whole power and hope lay in the Cross. The prophets of humanity still see furthest, when, from Hermon, they look by way of Calvary.

All through life I see a cross,
Where sons of God yield up their breath;
There is no gain except by loss;
There is no life, except in death,
Nor glory but in bearing shame,
Nor justice but in taking blame,
And that eternal Passion saith,
"Be emptied of glory, and right, and name."

So full was he of this prophecy in himself and for them, that the disciples kept the memory of Moses and Elias, speaking to him about the "exodus which he should accomplish at Jerusalem" (Luke 9: 31). As they went back to heaven, he found the glory of his transfiguration running through the tomb. They could speak to him about death only as the "exodus," and to be an achievement, though the words of these heavenly visitants seem to involve the glory which was to follow. They, however, must be silent about the secrets whose key he carried. But he could prepare his disciples to utter the magic word, by and by, "He is risen from the dead" (Matt. 17: 9).

Waiting for Light

Christ clearly recognized the fact that the disciples needed to have this scene connected in their minds with something which ultimately would make it plain. They had heard the conversation about the "exodus" which he was to "accomplish at Jerusalem." But that exodus meant only the death of their Lord to them, as yet. Christ saw their confusion in the words of Peter. Ever conscious as he was of how an unrelated truth, or an isolated fact, however luminous, deranges rather than continues the mind's steady advance, he bids silence until the greater truth and fact, to which this is related, shall come to their growing culture. In doing this, he showed that that glory beyond, of which this was such a strong intimation that Moses and Elias, in its light, talked about his exodus rather than his death alone, was the same glory of a coming Easter morning. He charged them that they should tell no man what they had seen, save when the Son of Man should be risen from the dead" (Mark 11: 10-13).

At the Crucifixion of Jesus, evil rose against the blindest manifestation of goodness the world ever knew, and demonstrated most tragically its own dark and hellish nature. But because good is good, and evil is evil, these two forces met at the Cross of Calvary, the determination of the question as to which must be the ever-increasing, and, finally, the universal master. Sin failed, even in the midst of its apparent triumph. As the evening after the Crucifixion came on, it seemed that the Eternal Love manifested in Jesus Christ had been overthrown by the temporary hate of men. It was not so. In its effort to kill Jesus in ignominy, sin had committed suicide and made him glorious.

Sin's Mortal Wound

Calvary is the name of the place where, and on Friday the name of the time when, sin becomes so horrible, in the presence of the breaking heart of God, that it reeled from the crucifix, wounded fatally. It may live on—as it has lived on for centuries—but the wound received on that Good Friday will provide death. As the anniversary approaches, year by year, sin rises from the place under the Cross where it fell; but its languor and weariness are more noticeable. Its ancient defiance is departing. Sin has never essayed to take so lofty a fortress as it lost at the Cross of Jesus of Nazareth. There is no such other light and bastion in human history or hope. Having dared against that, in vain, all history will ultimately give itself the story of the long retreat of evil from the "Lamb as it had been slain" (Rev. 5: 6). Before the Crucifixion was over, humanity, in the Roman Crucifixion, had confessed that the Cross of Christ is his throne; and as they were taking the lifeless body from the tree, earth had already begun to revolve in the morning tide of that day to which Jesus looked when he said: "And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men to me" (John 12: 32). The world is an increasingly better world; and it is clearly so, along the lines of Jesus' dying prayer to his Father. So stands the event of the Crucifixion between Jesus' transfiguration and his resurrection.

We must illustrate the manner of Christ's rising from the dead into living sovereignty within the soul of a human being, by attention to the case of Mary. Crucified in her, shall he be raised from the dead in her. He has been transfigured in her. Mary had come back from the tomb, and was eager and ready to tell the disciples what she and her companions had seen and heard on that morning. Now let us mark the operation of the law by which this transfigured Christ becomes the Christ who rises from the dead in the conviction of life, and the experience of Mary. Here is the account, simple, but how suggestive! "And as they went to tell his disciples, Jesus met them, saying, All hail. And they came and held him by the feet, and worshipped him. Then said Jesus unto them, Be not afraid: go tell my brethren that they go into Galilee, and there shall you see me" (Matt. 28: 9, 10).

The Story Told

At first, according to Mark's gospel, they had been so affrighted that they said nothing to anybody. It was soon all the disciples had the rapturous story. As it, however, they were unenraptured. Again they told testimony to the truth that they had entertained no participation of the Resurrection, by the fact that they received the words of the women unbelievably.

Peter and John began to feel something besides wonder. The statement of Mary aroused their curiosity. They, at length, yielded to the query of their souls, "What if it all be true?" And the impulsive man who had been most evidently honored by Love's ministrations the evening meal in the upper room, ran speedily toward the sepulchre. Love ever outruns impulse. John arrived first. Stooping down to search with affectionate eyegance for his Master's body, and saw nothing but the linen strips lying there. He was too amazed to enter, or possibly, was thoughtful of the ceremonial pollution which he might suffer if he went in. More probably, however, a noble reverence and solemn awe detained John at the doorway. Simon Peter, however, ardent and impetuous as ever, rushed into the tomb. Nothing but the ceremonial death, and the napkin which Love had tenderly laid upon the Christ's head at the last, were visible. The napkin was wrapped apart from the linen.

Here is a lesson concerning this law of resurrection. Christ, in the progress of humanity, leaves behind of the grave-clothes, which are the creeds and institutions of time; as he emerges, fresh with eternity, from the rock-hewn tombs in which, at the expense of Jesus the rich, and Nicodemus the politic, we bury him. The invisible Lord of Life had gone forth to rule the world. John now entered, saw, and believed. Soon the transformed men, so lately panic-stricken and despairing, now so quick to realize the true Kingship of Jesus, went away to their home. They were not quite delivered

Our First Official Easter

A UNIQUE service has been held in old St. Paul's Chapel (Trinity Parish, Broadway and Vesey Street, New York), every Sunday morning during Lent, at 2.30 o'clock A.M. It is for printers, newspaper men, telegraph operators, and all classes of night workers. At the first service 103 men were present. Rev. W. Montague Geer, Vicar of St. Paul's Chapel, the originator of the movement, is in charge of the services, which consist of singing, prayers, and a simple spiritual address. The services may be continued throughout the year. The time limit for each service is forty minutes. St. Paul's Chapel (Trinity Parish), is the only remaining Colonial church building in New York City. It was erected A.D. 1776. On September 15, 1766, Admiral Lord Howe, and Sir Henry Clinton took possession of the city. On the 21st, one-eighth of the city, including Trinity Church, was burned, and St. Paul's narrowly escaped. The ruins of Trinity Church stood until after the Revolution, and for twelve years St. Paul's was the Parish church. It contains the record of many interesting historical facts connected with Colonial days. President Washington's pew, over which the seal of the United States is placed, is an object of interest, while opposite, marking the pew of Governor George Clinton, is also the coat-of-arms of New York State. When the patriots went through the city destroying everything which symbolized our allegiance to the mother country, the coat-of-arms of the Prince of Wales, on the summit of the chapel's gable-end escaped their notice, and here it has remained until now.

PRESIDENT WASHINGTON AND HIS CABINET IN ST. PAUL'S CHAPEL

On April 30, 1789, the inauguration of Washington took place. The incidents of this great occasion are very graphically told by the historian. He says: "The clergy, including the Rt. Reverend Bishop Provost, at St. Paul's Chapel, assembled in their places of worship to give expression to that reverent and profound desire which filled all hearts, and in which the religious sense was so universal!" After the inauguration, his Excellency, the President, accompanied by the Vice-President, the Speaker of the House of Representatives (Frederick A. Muhlenburg), and both Houses of Congress, went to St. Paul's Chapel, Broadway and Vesey Street, where divine service was held by Right Reverend Doctor Samuel Provost, Bishop of the Episcopal Church in New York State, and Chaplain to Congress. A solemn Te Deum was sung by choir and congregation. The appropriate services being ended, George Washington, "The Father of his Country," was escorted to his house, and the citizens retired to their homes. Thus closed the first official Easter service held in New York after the birth of the young Republic.

In Washington's diary, which is still preserved, there are frequent references to his attendance at church. The first official service in St. Paul's in the Easter time of the year 1789 has become a part of the religious history of the country, and constitutes one of the most memorable pages in the nation's history. At that service, the blessing of the Almighty was invoked upon the government and people, and this public recognition of the Divine Sovereignty stamped us as a Christian nation. M. B. C.

from painful alarm, however, and home was a good place in which they could muse and pray. Even yet, no one had so seen Jesus, and so recognized him, as to make a faith in his resurrection clear and strong. He was still a dead Christ. The glory of his vision, and the rapture of this faith were first accorded to Mary Magdalene. It is always so. "All things" (even our sin, if it is forgiven; our lovelessness, it is transformed into love), "work together for good to them that love the Lord." Only to such as was Mary Magdalene is possible the vision-power, surpassing that of the apostle and saint who has not had a similar experience with Jesus the Christ. Mary was again looking into the tomb. The two angels said unto her: "Woman, why weepest thou?" And she said unto them: "Because they have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him" (John 20: 13). Christ had not yet risen from the dead for her life.

Having said this, her attention was attracted to someone near her. It must never be forgotten that the heavenly personages unknown to the disciples and the women at the resurrection, appeared to be very human, as did Moses and Elias at the transfiguration. Even as they carried out the purpose of Jesus, to make human life divine. The angelic presences are spoken of as "young men." Jesus, himself, who now speaks to her, saying: "Woman, why weepest thou? whom seekest thou?" (John 20: 15), places nothing before her anxious gaze, which, by any outward glory, forbids the supposition that the gardener had come near. Divinity Jesus was so divine that he could afford that he would be mistaken for the owner of the garden.

An illustration of the true method of the development of faith in Jesus, as the Divine Incarnation, is furnished in the steps of Mary's spiritual journey, by which she discerns Christ. "Supposing him to be the gardener,"—this is the plane upon which Jesus is willing that faith shall start. It is not a large or long creed, but it was satisfactory to him, at least to begin with. "Supposing him to be the gardener," it only touches the garment of his humanity, and that feebly and partially. When we see Christ in the process of history—the goodness once entombed, and now having proved its unimprisonableness—we are apt to treat him only as the most ordinary act in the realm of life. We think too superficially to ask for his commandment. Nevertheless Christ has come to us, to be our Lord. What was more in tune with the customary, than that the gardener should draw near, and what is more usual to our hopelessness, when, like Mary, we have seen all the good that we adored sepulchred, than that we, also, should mistake the infinite for the commonplace, and ask the ordinary where it has borne away the extraordinary? We say, somehow, what Mary said to her Lord: "Sir, if thou hast borne him hence, tell me where thou hast laid him, and I will take him away." Mary even yet has to be convinced that Jesus is risen from the dead. She is ready to provide for his body another tomb, if need be. So, also, is our unbelief ever anxious to do honor to the goodness in which it once believed.

Jesus was training Mary's personality. He rescued her to herself, in one familiar word of love, and that word was, "Mary." He must have pronounced it with an accuracy of Divine accent which fitted every movement of his soul to every old emotion of her heart or struggling thought of her mind. All her past, and all his past, as it was related to her, were vivified and made abundantly sympathetic, in his utterance of the word "Mary." It taught her, and she felt the presence of her Teacher again. Instantly she rose in her faith, which had essayed its highest when, just now, she had said, "Sir," supposing him to be the gardener, and she now turned, and going so far back into her own history that she took the provincial form of the word which a Galilean would appreciate, she said, "Rabboni"—"my Master."

It was a distinct advance in the growth of a great creed. It was to be the best kind of creed, for its growth registered the apprehension of love. Now the teachable one confessed her Teacher. She had moved a long way up in her Christology from the moment when she could only stammer forth the salutation, "Sir," to this moment, when she confessed Jesus' intellectual and spiritual rulership, in the word "Master."

And now love and friendship would grasp the beloved Master. Could there have been anything more natural than that her affection should manifest itself in an embrace? But Jesus was even then laying the foundations of the Kingdom of the Invisible, of which he was the Invisible King. Other than a bodily touching of the Christ would be needed, and must be vouchsafed to Mary and to all humanity. To save mankind to the highest to which men are capable, their Lord must be tangible only through his perpetual presence in the soul. He must summon the highest in her. He said: "Touch me not: for I am not yet ascended unto my Father." These were, at first, words of discouragement.

Was it possible that the Master was now separating himself from those human beings whom he had so brothered? Had his recent experience taken him into some far-away domain, in which no kinship of souls, such as he had fostered, could be realized? Was this man, who had been the most brotherly of all men, no longer a brother? Was the dream of the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man an abandoned vision?

If Mary's heart was perturbed by these thoughts, the concluding words of Jesus would make her rejoice, as they have given all Christian thinkers assurance that the logic of the universe is of Love. While his words: "Touch me not; for I have not yet ascended unto my Father," were yet echoing with their apparently isolating command, he immediately said, in addition: "But go unto my brethren." At length, the fact of human brotherhood had emerged from the overwhelming glory that seemed to separate him from them. "And say unto them," he said, "I ascend unto my Father." Again the phrase, "my Father," emphasized what might be a privilege and power belonging to Jesus alone. Would he now again reveal a majesty which his Father's other sons might not share? This was all answered when he said all that was in his mind: "I ascend unto my Father and your Father, and my God and your God." The Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man, the truth to whose proclamation he had given himself in life and in death, was now uttered at the instant, when, by his resurrection, he had revealed the power of God and the possibilities of humanity. But he had done more than this. He had foretold his ascension, to which his glorification was even now consummating—"I ascend unto my Father and your Father." At the ascension, the truth of the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man, would still be supreme.

Now Mary Magdalene had a complete and evangelic creed. It was not a belief of the head, but a faith of the heart. "I have seen the Lord," she said. This was the factual report she gave to the disciples. She had seen Jesus, first as "Sir," then as "Master," and at last, as "Lord." These are the three steps by which, even to-day, we who have seen him buried, come to know the deathless Christ, who is King of kings, and Lord of lords.

Oh, if we have seen goodness which was once glorious on some Mt. Hermon, buried after some Calvary, let us be willing to await the issue that surely comes on some Easter morning.

EASTER LILIES

BY ELLEN DOUGLAS MASTERS

WE know long ago, in a garden, One rose from a cold, rocky tomb, Resplendent with life and with beauty, as a lily that bursts into bloom.
Our faith is firm in His promise; our hope is anchored and strong;
But dear are the ones who are sleeping, and the winter of waiting is long.

O, speak to my heart, little prophets, in garments so holy and white,
And tell me again of the morning that follows the darkness of night—
The springtime of God, when the flowers shall rise from the dust and the mold,
To bloom in that beauty and fragrance, by lilies so truly foretold.

The FLOWERS OF EASTER-TIME

THE lily is pre-eminently the flower of the joyous Easter-tide. Florists make a specialty of raising the stately stalks, with their clear wax-white blossoms, and their windows are filled just before Easter, with these lovely, living tributes, breathing an incense holy and sweet to the Maker and Giver of all such beauty. As the lily bursts in regal loveliness, from the hard, dry, brown bulb, so joy and gladness at this time come to hearts sore and sad, by reason of many sorrows and trials, more or less inseparable from this life.

The cheerful jonquil lifts his yellow head and bids us smile; sunbeams are prisoned in his heart, which he will gladly share with us if we will but open our hearts to his brightness and cheer. Azaleas, with their rich, warm beauty, tell of the winter now past, and of the resurrection of the year, the glad time of an ever-new spring.

In the cities, not only are the florists' shops filled to overflowing with the rarest of blossoms, but even the sidewalks are abloom, and flower-markets spring up in the different squares, where only yesterday there were great piles of gray snow and ice. Thoughtless and careless indeed is the man who, on his way home from business, does not pause to pick out the tallest lily to carry home to his wife; never mind if it is shorn of half its blossoms by being carried home in a crowded car, there are plenty of buds which will replace the broken blossoms in time for Easter morning. So the little uptown flat is made glorious with the lily, and the wife's heart with renewed love that her husband should have remembered, and brought to her this token of his regard, with its waxen perfumed bells.

The little plebeian red geranium; how the pink in its swelling buds is watched by the poor woman whose "window-garden" in a tenement house consists of this one plant, which she has cherished with such tender care through the cold, dreary winter. Every night the plant has been taken from the window, covered and put in the warmest corner, to be replaced in the morning in its accustomed place where the sun sends its welcome warmth o'er branch and rootlet. How tenderly each time for the feathery fronds to peep from the brown heads; it is time to be up and doing for very gladness sake, and everywhere nature answers the call.

Little green things, with tiny flower eyes, give welcome to Easter, and for those who search with the love of nature in their hearts, there is a wealth of beauty lying in sunny covers and sheltered places in the woods and fields, where there is a resurrection, such as no city, with all its hot-house flowers and its magnificent church adornment, can know.

It is now that the farm wife renews and redoubles her efforts that certain of her floral pets shall put forth their blossoms, and seldom do they disappoint the good woman's forecasting care. Her tasks are almost endless from long before the sun comes up until long after dark; but there is always a few moments every day when she may be found hovering over her plants. The calla, which had but a solitary blossom last year, now shows three white-green waxy buds, and as the days precede the Glad Day slip so quickly, how anxiously does the flower-mother watch those buds. The pot is set each morning in a dish of steaming hot water, and the lily is carried by careful hands from one window to another, that it may have the benefit of every bit of sun to be had. It is not altogether for her own sake in the lily, although she loves it, as only women who have learned to love, that the farm wife is so anxious; but the beautiful flower is to bring cheer to a sick room, where its glory will overshadow all that is sad and gloomy, bringing peace, and hope, as the glad Easter day shines on. There are other flowers in the window-garden at the farmhouse, but none more blessed than the beautiful calla.

"Resplendent with life and with beauty" dead leaf is removed, and with what care the earth is loosened around the roots, and warm water given at just the right time. And when the gorgeous bunches of scarlet blossoms burst forth, what joy and happiness their brightness brings. To the woman of the tenements, the scarlet-crowned geranium in the little window brings more happiness, than a whole conservatory full of the choicest blooms to the woman of wealth, who never knows the joy of ministering to one of God's angels, until the miracle of its unfolding wings, in marvelous beauty and coloring, is accomplished—a living epitome of God's power.

Out in the woods, little brown heads are awakening from their long dreamless sleep under the dead leaves and snow, and stretching upward as the delicate wood fern roots tell that spring is here, and it is

IN THE FOREST

MARY SARGENT HOPKINS

NOW comes the season of gladness,
When the dark forest aisles are astir,
By the quest for the Tree of Remembrance,
More fragrant than incense or myrrh.
The trees bend their heads in rejoicing,
For the gift of this fair Easter morn;
Through their boughs comes a soft Benediction,
From the heart of the Bethlehem-born.
Comes a voice from deeper recesses,
Where the wooded paths still are untrod,
That tells of respite and healing
In the forest—the Temple of God.

EASTER IN RUSSIA

Quaint Ceremonies with which the Festival is Observed in the Land of the Czar

QUEEN of all the church festivals, Easter occupies the most prominent place in the ecclesiastical year throughout Christendom; but nowhere is it celebrated with so much magnificence and popular rejoicing as it is in Russia. Wherever the Russo-Greek Church is found, there the same ceremonies are observed with all the grandeur the circumstances admit; in the great cities of Russia, the spectacle is the great event of the year, and even in the villages the peasants do their utmost to make the celebration as imposing as possible. For months beforehand, every copeck is carefully saved, so that at least one new garment may be worn for the first time on Easter day, and if the funds can be raised, a complete new outfit is donned. Men and women meeting one another, change the salutation of "Good morning" to "Christ has risen," and are answered with, "He is risen indeed." Formerly a kiss, or three kisses, accompanied the salutation whether the greeting was between men and men, or between men and women, and in the country districts the custom is still continued.

The contrast in the celebration which occurs in the early morning of Easter-day with the previous gloom, is most impressive. Friday and Saturday of Passion week are rigid fasts, and by the most devout, Thursday is also a fast day. Men and women who have neglected the confession all the year, seek the priest, and pour into his ear the long record of sins of omission and commission, for all want absolution that they may take the communion on Easter-day. Prepared by confession and fasting—the latter not the mere abstention from meat which constitutes fasting in eastern churches, but abstention from all kinds of food—the people go on Saturday evening to their church. At each door a priest stands waiting to receive them. Thence in procession the priests walk to the altar when the chanting begins. Relays of priests continue the service the whole night through, the consumption being reached at what is known as cock-crowing. Two services are held later in the day, but the attendance does not compare with the great service of the early hours. The rigorous fast of the two or three previous days prepares the people for the dinner of Easter-day, as the solemnity of Lent prepares them for the pleasures of Easter week. Easter Monday and Tuesday are always observed as holidays, and many spread the festivity over the whole week. A favorite amusement is the breaking of Easter eggs. These are dyed red or yellow, and when two peasants meet, each tendence does not compare with the great service of the early hours. gives us a helping hand. Through your charity, you have satisfied the starving. Christ is risen! Thus do the poor rejoice who have received this help from the Americans, and they break out into singing, Christ is risen!" It is very gratifying to think that this humble peasant was moved, not only to thank the donors, but to see in the gift a proof of the influence the risen Christ was exerting over their hearts, realizing that the poor of his people had been fed for Christ's sake.

The Singing Hour

My Father's Hymn-book

BY ELEANOR ECOB MORSE

FADED and torn, the covers old,
The book my father used to hold
With reverent mien, so long ago.
The children clustered, all aglow,
For now the singing hour had come,
Dear to each heart in that sweet home.

The youngest sat, a babe, apart,
Clasped warmly to the mother's heart,
Yet lifting up those clear gray eyes
(Long filled with light in Paradise),
Yet adding then, with happy face,
Her sweet voice, right in time and place.

We sang, "On Jordan's stormy banks,"
And where, in blooming stately ranks,
Heaven's fairest fragrant flowers grow
Untouched by time or frost, the glow
Upon my father's face, when we Sang of that land we all should see.

We sang, "My soul be on thy guard,"
And then were gently told to ward,
With constant watch the foes we meet;
Then, reverently, "The Mercy Seat,"
Then, "When my righteous judge shall come
To call His ransomed children home."

My father's voice "Shall we be there?"
Waked in my trembling heart despair;
But when we sang "Redeeming love,"
Of hosts ingathered, crowned above,
My heart sprang upward, as the lark
Spurning the dim earth and the dark,

Pours forth its rapture to the skies;
So lifted I my childish eyes,
When we "Salvation free," sang out;
And if a sob subdued my shout,
'Twas half of joy, and half of shame,
That "I no more revered His name."

Then last, we sang of "Home, Sweet Home,
Ah, when shall we, too, thither come?"
The questions answered, one by one,
The singers laid their armor down
Even to the babe, whose heavenly eyes
Have smiled so long in Paradise.

And we who stay, so small a band!
Are gathering upon the strand
Full Pilgrim worn, but still the cheer
And courage from those hymns so dear,
The memory of those singing hours,
Have toned and strengthened all our powers.

And often when depressed and sad,
Faint, far-off voices, sweet and glad,
In dim recesses of the soul,
Sing softly from the undying scroll
That memory keeps, hid deep away,
Immortal transcript of each day.

THE WAR IN THE FAR EAST

THE PORT OF NEW-CHWANG, WITH THE RUSSIAN GUNBOAT, "SIVOUTCH," (1); U. S. GUNBOAT, "HELENA," (2); AND BRITISH WARSHIP, "ESPIEGLE," (3), FROZEN IN

HURRYING FORWARD RUSSIAN REINFORCEMENTS IN MANCHURIA
RUSSIA'S STRENGTH IN THE FIELD IS NOW ABOUT 230,000

WITH the breaking up of the winter, there are signs of increased activity in the Far-Eastern campaign. Gen. Kouropatkin, who is doubtless now in command at Moukden, has a vast army available in that neighborhood and at Harbin, for carrying out his plans to check the Japanese advance. A despatch from Moukden received at Cheefoo, March 19, says that a battle has taken place on the Yalu, in which the Russians have captured 1,800 prisoners. There are no details.

Russia's forces at the present moment are distributed as follows: Between Moukden and Harbin, 180,000; Liao-Tung Peninsula, 25,000; Kuilien-chung, 40,000; Feng-wang-cheng, 2,000; Corea and Southwestern Manchuria, 25,000. Great herds of cattle for camp supplies are being driven to Moukden, Liao-Yeng and Haichen. All danger of a short commissariat is now ended.

Japan, too, is pushing matters vigorously, and now that the ice is breaking up, her fleets of transports are kept busy landing thousands of troops daily at points near her objective in Northern Corea. On March 18, large bodies of Japanese were landing at Chinampo, and a constant succession of transports was passing up the Korean coast, guarded by Japanese gunboats. Strong detachments of troops were placed in each Korean town. Americans who had come to Chemulpho united in declaring that the whole administration of northern Corea was now in the hands of the Japanese. Owing to ice and other difficulties, the landing at Chinampo was tedious, but the troops were using pontoon jetties and landing barges. Rain, snow, frost and blizzards had succeeded each other; but the advance had progressed notwithstanding. On the march, the troops made about twenty-five miles a day, carrying one hundred pounds per man, and bivouacking in the Korean villages; sleeping in the warm native houses and paying for everything in full. At the Cheng-seng, the outposts of both armies were still almost in touch, though the Russians were reported as retreating. A large force of Russian troops is concentrated at Kuilien-chung, north of the Yalu river. What other forces may be in the neighborhood cannot be known, as no news of the Russian movements in northern Corea is obtainable. There is, however, an abundance of unverified rumors, one being to the effect that a detachment of 300 Cossacks had encountered and almost annihilated a body of 200 Japanese near Pyeng-Yang.

On March 15, the United States cruiser Cincinnati arrived at Chemulpho from Chinampo. She brought twenty-two women and three men from the northern missions and mines. All are well. They journeyed to Chinampo in carts and palanquins bearing American flags. The party from the mines were escorted to Pyeng-Yang. They met near Anju small parties of Cossacks, but were not molested. While going to the coast from Pyeng-Yang, they were stopped and questioned five times by Japanese, who treated them courteously. The Japanese were everywhere in great force. The refugees warmly praise the officers of the Cincinnati for the treatment accorded them.

Our missionaries at Pyeng-Yang, Corea, one of the localities most likely to be affected by the war, have decided to remain at their posts, with their families, notwithstanding the advice of United States Minister Allen, who urged them to leave. He offered to put them, with their wives and children, on board the United States cruiser Cincinnati, and to convey them to a place of safety. They are evidently hopeful that the real theatre of military operations will be further north. They have been warned by our government that, if they remain, they must take their chances.

Russia has notified Corea that, in view of the aid it is would prove much more troublesome to Russia than the petty forces of Corea.

Expert opinions now differ on the question where the first great clash on land will occur near New Chwang or in Southeastern Manchuria. It is believed that the Japanese may land at Kai-Chow, instead of at Kinchow, the port of New Chwang, and that the latter is less likely to be the scene of attack. They are reported to have landed a force already near Daikoku. As to the position in the north, it is asserted by the leading newspaper in Tokio, that a large Japanese force, 60,000 strong, has crossed into the interior from Fusan, in northern Corea, and that Gens. Kuroki, Oshima and Ozaka have seized the northwest bank of the river Tooman, giving them command of the military route leading northeast to Vladivostok and southwest to Wiju. If this corps is intended for active operations it would have the effect of transferring the area of conflict from Corea wholly into the enemy's country, leaving the main line from Seoul northward to the Yalu free for transportation of supplies to the armies in the field. That so highly important a movement is under way would appear from the fact that all newspaper correspondents have been directed to remain at Seoul till further orders. This secret movement is probably connected with the landing of another army corps, now on transport, which is intended to co-operate with those already in the field, pushing the Japanese military front still further northwestward. Northern Corea is, however, by no means free of Russian troops, although the main force in the peninsula seems to have retired beyond the Yalu, there are still considerable bodies south of the river. As late as March 17, 1,500 Cossacks made a dash between Wiju and Pyeng-Yang, firing at Japanese troops on the further side of the Seisenko River.

Viceroy Alexieff's plan of concentrating a vast army to arrest the Japanese advance in Manchuria, being carried out systematically. Thousands of troops arrive daily at Moukden, and Harbin is already a great military camp. All the hopes of Russia are now centered on Gen. Kouropatkin, whose military genius, it is believed, will be equal to the emergency. Not in a campaign within the memory of any living Russian has so great a force been gathered together as that which Kouropatkin will have supreme control, when he confronts the Japanese invaders.

Port Arthur, though terribly battered by the repeated attacks of Admiral Togo's fleet, was still holding out March 10. Authentic accounts of the bombardment of March 10, have reached Shanghai, by the captains of crews of three Norwegian steamers, The Brand, Argo and Seirstad, which were chartered by Russia as transports. During the firing, a Japanese shell fell on the deck of the warship Retvizan, which lay alongside the Argo, and exploded, killing ninety extending to Japan, the Czar's government has decided to treat it as a belligerent. Corea, therefore, seems disposed to take the field alongside of Japan. A Seoul dispatch states that 2,000 Korean soldiers now stationed there, will proceed northward, and that more will shortly follow. It is hardly probable that the Korean army will be a factor of importance in any event, being insignificant in point of numbers, poorly armed and inexperienced in warfare. Much more significant is the news from Pekin, that the Chinese Viceroy Yuan-shikai and General Ma are threatening to take the field with a considerable armed force, if Russia continues to despatch troops west of the Liao River. The Tartar general, Tseng-Chi, who is in command of the Chinese garrison at Moukden, has been driven out with his troops by Viceroy Alexieff. Any serious collision between Chinese and Russians at the present time would result in bringing a new element into the conflict, which

The Puritan

A more attractive subject for the painter's art than this sweet-faced Puritan maid could hardly be imagined. Standing amid the wintery woods, with an apron filled with freshly gathered holly sprigs, she presents a picture of buoyant, healthy youth, which is tremendously attractive.

Bridesmaid Roses

Franz Morteelmans' painting, Bridesmaid Roses, is a characteristic example of the work of this clever young Belgian artist—crisp, delicate in color, and well drawn. It possesses all the charm which the flowers themselves possess, except their fragrance.

The Harbor of Venice

This is a work of romantic imagination, splendid color and masterly technique. The Venice which Mr. Moran has painted, is the Venice of the poets with the glistening marble palaces, stately monuments, gorgeous skies, and limpid water, reflecting the brilliant colors of the buildings and the painted sails of the harbor craft.

A Lesson in Geometry

This delightful painting shows a mother cat and her two kittens at play, on the study table of a professor of geometry. The playful kittens are romping with the delicate instruments and having a lively time, while the mother sits sedately by. Every lover of cats will be delighted with this life-like painting of the animals in their most charming mood.

THE WICKEDNESS OF FATTY

By OWEN KILDARE

THE antecedents of newsboys are so deeply shrouded in mystery that inquiries concerning them are sure to provoke much lying. Among themselves, in their busy and strenuous life, there is neither time nor inclination to ask many questions, beyond, "Say, are you a new one?" or "Gee, where d'you come from?"

So, it was not on account of his past, but on account of present things, that Fatty reached a prominent place in popularity on Park Row.

One morning he came, with a dime clutched tightly in his hand, and asked one of the veterans, "Where can I buy papers to sell them?"

The old-timer gave just one glance at the apparition being appointed equerry by, and to, Officer Smith. The policeman's relations with the newsboys of the locality were decidedly anomalous. Instead of being considered the sworn enemy of the boys, he was exceedingly popular with them, and, in return, gave them as much latitude as the law allowed. According to his young admirers, he was no "grafter" or "cincher," but was known to pay for every little errand or message, and even to pay actual money for his paper. But the ambition of all the boys was that position of equerry, which fell to Fatty. The duties were most agreeable, and consisted mainly in running to Hitchcock's for ten cents' worth of coffee and "sinkers," which were hastily swallowed by the officer in a nearby doorway. At other times, Fatty would have to keep a sharp lookout for the "rounds," so that his policeman would not be taken unaware by the superior officer.

Things had gone very well with Fatty. He very soon reached that height indicative of affluence, of having a "steady" bed in the Newsboys' Lodging House, which meant that "carrying the banner"—spending a bedless night—was an exercise not practised by him any more. He ate at least once a day, regularly, and his circle of steady customers kept increasing. Without becoming vainglorious, Fatty felt himself a factor in the Commonwealth, and seriously began to look forward to the time when he would eat three meals a day every day, or, at least, buy one of those meal-tickets which are supposed to last a week, but which without any great inconvenience, can be demolished in a day or two.

But the higher a man soars into the clouds the closer does he get to the lurking thunderbolt. Fatty was not a meteorologist, and unacquainted with the fact that the sweetest calm always precedes the most vicious storm. The officers of the metropolitan police force work in shifts, called platoons, and besides being frequently subjected to having their posts in the precinct changed, they are at times, for various reasons, transferred from one precinct to another. The working schedule of Officer Smith was memorized by Fatty, who was as regularly on post as the policeman himself. It never occurred to Fatty that his uniformed friend was also amenable to the regulations of the Department, and when at last the unexpected happened, and a strange policeman supplanted Smith, everything seemed to be thrown out of plumb. The new man was Officer O'Flaherty. A strong suspicion arose immediately concerning the officer's nationality. He was suspected of being Irish, and the boys unanimously resolved to call him "the harp," but not to his face, as that surely would have hurt his feelings. In addition, it might be stated that Officer O'Flaherty was not the tallest, but certainly the heaviest member of the force. And this means something—for everybody knows that the force numbers many heavyweights.

Conforming to established custom, Fatty presented himself to the new officer at the accepted time.

"Will I go over and get your coffee and sinkers?" Curving his glance over his embonpoint, the policeman asked gruffly: "What do you mane?"

Fatty explained how it had been. O'Flaherty liked the idea, and, fishing a dime from his pocket, sent the boy on his accustomed errand. The "rounds" had recently passed the beat, so there was no fear of interference, and getting the steaming coffee and cakes from his messenger, O'Flaherty retired to the doorway pointed out by Fatty as the appointed refuge, and gave himself up to solid, if selfish, comfort. The selfishness will soon be apparent.

With his bundle of papers under his arm, Fatty hung around expectantly. His friend, Officer Smith, had always purchased a paper during this repast, paying for it with a nickel, which included the "tip" for the errand. Also just a mouthful of coffee had always been left in the little tin can.

"Don't you want no paper?" he asked at last, making allowance for O'Flaherty's ignorance of Park Row ways.

"Sure," came the answer from filled mouth.

Another period of suspense, during which Fatty studied the subject before him, and came to the conclusion that he was "up against a tough proposition."

O'Flaherty swallowed the last bit of cake with the last mouthful of coffee, and, shoving the newspaper into his coat-tail pocket, proceeded to go back to his beat.

"Say, you ain't paid yet for that paper," remarked Fatty.

"What! me pay for a paper?" the cop laughed. "Get out, sonny. That's all right. You stick to me and me up with this coffee and cake business and I'll me it all right with you."

To learn the ways of the world is one of the accomplishments of those who live and work in the street, and Fatty had a well-formed scepticism concerning the reliability of policemen as profitable investments. Still, he did not want to be too hasty in drawing conclusions and decided to give the new cop a trial, hoping against hope that perhaps a weekly stipend was to be paid to him for his services by O'Flaherty.

And the sidewalk was very slippery.

Very soon various reports of O'Flaherty's stings came to Fatty's ears, and he began to fear for the outcome of his speculation. At the end of the week, when O'Flaherty was partaking of the refreshment brought to him by Fatty, the latter attempted to collect his bill.

"You got six papers from me," he began.

"Don't you worry, sonny. I'll have more than that by and by, and maybe I'll be taking two papers a day from you."

"But you ain't paid me nothing yet, and I been bringing you your coffee, too, every day."

"Pay, is it? Policemen ain't supposed to pay for them kind o' things. They do favors. Ain't I been letting you stand on the corner all these days and me more money than any o' the rest o' the boys?"

"Yes, but I'll bring you your coffee for that. I got to pay for the papers, and I ain't going to lose money like that."

"Oh, you ain't? Well, you know what happens to kids that get fresh to policemen. So, you better get up to the corner and sell your papers."

And the sidewalk was very slippery.

It is not hard to analyze Fatty's feelings. The tendency of Officer Smith had spoiled the boy's view of the typical police character. He was willing to do an errand for the privilege of standing on the corner, his sense of fairness revolted at the idea of having to give some of his stock in trade, of which no part could be had on credit, to a man who was well able to pay for it. The code of boyish ethics had only one applicable law for such a case, and that was—"hunk."

A sleepless night, spent in viewing the situation, resulted in a well-perfected scheme. And the sidewalk was very slippery, to which must be added, that Officer O'Flaherty was very fat.

No change was noticeable in Fatty on the following day, as he offered to go for the coffee. He returned promptly, and after seeing the policeman safely scolded in the sheltering doorway, he spread his papers on the sidewalk and seemed to be sorting them. A close before him, and then yelled, "Hey, fellows, come and look what's going to sell poipers."

"The moment after . . . they started for the station-house"

The mob, hanging around the delivery room of the World, clustered around the newcomer and made him the centre point of many frank comments and dainty witticisms. You can imagine what a crowd of newsboys can do in that line. On the other hand, it must be admitted that the new boy was sufficiently different from the others to invite special interest.

Instead of being dark, grimy, ragged and ill-fed, he was fair of hair and complexion, still clean and neatly dressed, and, above all, apparently far from being ill-fed.

"Say, what's your name?" shouted one.

"Carter Woodward Tomlinson," answered the boy, with perfect unconcern, not prepared for the storm of merriment which immediately broke loose.

His name was fairly torn into shreds and howled in gleeful variations. But, instead of being angered by it, the boy joined in the laugh, and thereby got his passport into their good graces.

"Say, kid," said the oldest member of the gang and, evidently, their leader, "you'd better shake that name. It's a little too tony for down here, and, if I was you, I'd get a plainer one."

"But how can I get another one?" asked the boy, recognizing the other's friendly overtures.

"Gee, that's dead easy. Say, fellows, what we're going to call the kid?"

An avalanche of appellations were thrown out immediately, but the boy's personal appearance settled the matter. Newsboy language is remarkably direct and takes no note of finer linguistic shadings. "Skinny" was out of the question in this case, as the victim of this free-and-easy christening was rather plump. To call him "plumpy" was almost impracticable, as such a word had never been heard of by the Arabs, and so there was nothing left but to call him "Fatty."

The ceremony having been properly concluded, Fatty was one of their own, and quickly lost his position in the focus of curiosity, something else attracting the attention of the shiftless nomads.

In due time Fatty became a member of some particular clique and chose his special friends. To some of them he spoke in a vague way of his past; how he had come from somewhere in the country, mostly by foot and sometimes by train, to get away from a bad uncle, who had taken him in after the mother died, and who had expected him of eight to do the work of a man of eighteen. But, as we know, they all had their little dramas back of them, and were poor receptacles for this sort of confidences.

When the winter came, Fatty was entirely established and was somewhat of a favorite, thanks to his looks and equanimity of temper, which enabled him to take a joke—and play one. He was further distinguished by "The lady gave him no chance at all"

observer would have wondered why this was done with only one hand, and what the other hand, under the papers, was doing. (In confidence, I may tell you, that besides the coffee and sinkers, Fatty had brought a handful of soft soap from the coffee saloon, which the proprietor had willingly given to him, and of which Officer O'Flaherty knew naught.)

The last mouthful of coffee went down the policeman's throat with a grunt of regret; the paper, which he had demanded as usual, was slipped into the pocket, and O'Flaherty was again ready to protect the city from riot and rebellion. The entire flagging in front of the door was covered with a thin coating of ice and the cop stepped very gingerly—still the sidewalk was very slippery—soft soap helped it along, and Officer

O'Flaherty was very, very fat. One of the boys, describing the accident afterwards, earnestly declared that "See, when he landed on the broad of his back with a bump, you could hear it up in Harlem, and all them buildings round here got shaky!"

It would be advisable here to leave a margin for Fatty's imagination. But it cannot be denied that O'Flaherty came down with a solid, stunning bump which made him helpless for the time being.

Fatty was transfixed by the complete result of his crime, and in place of removing himself to safe quarters, stood by gloatingly. At the bottom of his heart was a great deal of kindly spirit and faith in humanity in general, and when his revenge had been satisfied, he felt genuine sympathy for the unwieldy thing in brass and brass, sprawling on its stomach like a mud turtle.

"I'll give you a hand to get on your feet," he said, springing the action to his word.

"Good boy, good boy," groaned O'Flaherty, clumsily getting up, and still holding on to Fatty's hand.

As soon as the policeman had regained his equilibrium, Fatty remembered awfully important business elsewhere and tried to go after it, but was restrained by the representative of law and order.

"Hold on a minute, sonny; not so fast," and the great paw closed tighter.

O'Flaherty was misplaced on the uniformed force. He should have been a detective.

Carefully making his way back to the exact spot of his downfall, he felt it with his bare hand, smelled his finger, and uttered the one significant word, "Soap!"

The moment after his discovery, Fatty and David started for the prison-house, and visions of striped skirts and even gallows rose before the trembling Fatty.

It was early in the afternoon, and, after having been entered at the prison-house, Fatty and his captor went right to the Court, where the session was in full swing, and viewed by a quartette of interested spectators, who had been honored by seats beside the judge.

On due time O'Flaherty's turn to give his ever watchful vigilance came.

"Yer 'Onor! I—"

"Where's your prisoner?" queried the magistrate.

Fatty had silently stood at the brier for the arraignment of criminals, trying hard to feel and look resigned. A court officer lifted him to the judge's desk, and his elevated appearance there was greeted with a chorus of "Oh!" "What a pity!" and "It's a shame!" by the interested spectators, who were ladies, representing an educational institution for boys. "What is the complaint, officer?" spoke the judge, looking sternly at the accused and accused.

Before O'Flaherty has fairly started on his narrative, sternness had flown from the judge's features, the lies were burying their faces in handkerchiefs, and the rest of the people fairly shook the walls of the court-room with loud laughter, as the corpulent policeman graphically described his concussion on the sidewalk.

"Well," began the judge, after hearing the complaint, vainly trying to look the part of an avenging mesias—"What have you got to say for yourself, young man?"

"I ain't got nothing to say," and pointing at O'Flaherty, "he said it all."

The laughter broke out afresh.

"But don't you realize what you did?"

"Yes, sir, I bumped the cop," Fatty whimpered.

Again the court proceedings stopped. "Don't you see that you were very wicked to—to bump the cop? Do you know what is to become of you?"

"I guess I get hung or something," came the answer,ammering, accompanied by a few shining tears, which made Fatty look like an abused cherub.

"Well, the law does not prescribe hanging for the crime of bumping"—there are some very humane and, to human judges in our courts—"But if I let you go, will you behave yourself, and not forget that you were very wicked, a very wicked boy?"

"Yes, sir, I'm very wicked."

"Now, remember that, and whenever you see anything that is apt to lead you into temptation, just say to yourself—'I'm a very wicked boy.'"

They were about to lead Fatty beyond the enclosing railing, when the judge called him back, and instructed a court attendant to bring the boy into his private room. All this was caused by a few whispered words one of the ladies had spoken to the judge at the close of the case.

Fatty felt very uncomfortable in the big room, decorated by the paintings of former judges, who seemed to glower at him and say: "You are a very, very wicked boy." He looked from one stern face to another without finding mercy, and did what was most natural, burst into weeping. He did not hear the door opening again, or the soft footfall of the lady, and did not know of her presence until two arms gathered him close to a breast.

"You poor boy; cold, crying, no doubt hungry, and—"

"Wicked!" augmented Fatty the enumeration of his different traits.

The laugh that followed was so soft and melodious that Fatty wiped his eyes in surprise and looked at his comforter. And the lady simply gave him no chance at all, but constituting herself another judge, drew all his little history from Fatty.

How it really happened Fatty cannot quite recall, but ere he almost knew it, he was lifted from one of those "hightone coaches" and led up to a big mansion by his fairy lady.

"James," spoke the lady to a servant, "lay another plate. We have a guest," and her hand stroked Fatty's tear-stained cheek.

"Fatty found himself in the man's arms."

Fatty gave up all reasoning, and let events take their course impassively. The lady's deft fingers arranged his hair, refreshed his heated face with cool sponging, and made him in a few minutes very presentable. He was taken by the hand and led into a big room, centered by a table with snowy linen and much glittering ware; and at the table a man eating. Fatty did not see him until the very last, his attention being held by the many other things, such as pictures and "funny chairs, more like beds," and "all kinds of comical figures, some o'them in gold, and some o'them white—maybe made from sugar." At last he saw the man and was seen by him. There was no spontaneous mutual liking.

"May I ask what new whim this is?" asked the man.

Before the lady could answer, Fatty did.

"I'm a very wicked boy, the judge says." The smile which flitted over the lady's face found no reflection in the features of the man.

"Don't you think you are carrying this a trifle too far?" the man said impatiently, "As it is, we have become the laughing stock of our friends and relatives. All our social ties and obligations are forgotten by you, and, instead of filling your position in society, you insist on dawdling your time away in hospitals, missions, institutions and so forth. My likes and desires are absolutely neglected, and now you bring the scum of the street to my house. Yes, even to my table, Marie. I will not stand this any longer."

The lady and Fatty had both remained standing during the husband's harangue. When he had finished, the lady helped Fatty to a chair before seating herself.

"Do not make a scene before the servants and the boy," she spoke quietly, looking into her husband's lowering eyes.

"Do you insist on having this—this street Arab at table?"

"I do, and you too will insist when you have heard his message."

"If he has a message for me, let him deliver it and go. I will not sit here with brats picked up by you, heaven knows where."

"I shall deliver it for him," said the wife, and ordered the servants to leave the room. As soon as the three were left alone, she spoke again: "Do you remember Alice Foster?"

The man almost jumped from his chair.

"See here, Marie, do not trifle with me! That, you agreed was to remain forgotten by both of us. I told you all, and you forgave me. And—anyway what has it to do with this case?"

"You will understand very shortly," said the wife, and led by her the husband found himself back in his past.

The old New Hampshire village with its restfulness and peace; his courtship of the minister's daughter; their poverty, which prevented their speedy marriage; his coming to the great city to make his fortune; his success and gradual dislike of his humble friends and native village, were all lived by him again.

"Stop," he cried to her, who recounted these memories.

But she kept on, and reminded him how he had neglected everything in his greed for wealth; how he had broken faith with the girl home and had married her, Marie, because of her social connections and assured position; and how his heart and mind had become embittered and—

"You told me; but not until long after we were married. You were afraid, and rightly so, that I would not have consented to marriage under these conditions. Then, when I knew all, I wanted to live your atonement and do good for the evil you have done. I hoped you would see, feel, my purpose, and help me in its accomplishment; but you only had sneers for me and my work, and have made life very hard for me."

"Marie, Marie, do not go on like that. I cannot deny that I have wronged you, but we cannot undo it. And the case is not so bad as you paint it. You will remember that I made inquiries to learn if—if those people in New Hampshire were in need, and found that she—that Alice, had married, and was presumably happy. If I knew that she or any of her folks needed anything, I would be the very first to offer them all possible assistance. That, at least, you will believe? But, as I said, they are all well and happy."

"I think they are, because both the girl and her husband are dead," whispered the wife. She pointed at the boy. "That is her son."

Fatty, worn out by the excitement of the day and not kept busy by the eating he had expected, had fallen asleep. His hair tumbled over his forehead, the tear peeping from between his eyelashes and his evident exhaustion made a pitying picture, and the husband, hearing how his wife had found the little wanderer by chance, expecting him to be nothing else only an ordinary street waif, buried his head in his hands.

"Marie—wife—forgive me. I have been very, very wicked."

It was Fatty's cue. Even in his slumber it was potent.

"Wicked," he murmured, still half asleep. "Yes, I'm a very wicked boy."

When he fully awoke, he found himself in the arms of the man, and liked him much better than at first sight.

"Do you want him to go?" asked the wife, coming close to both.

His answer was his outstretched hand, which was taken by the wife, and the three were joined together.

They have been very happy ever since, although society knows little about them. The wife, when criticised for permitting her whole family—husband and Fatty—to give so much time and money to the poor, only smiles and says, "We are trying to outlive our wickedness."

I know this, because I know and love them.

WOOLING AND WEDDING IN COREA

g, it is not uninteresting to note that our Korean sisters are also minus the one and plus the other. They wear a little bag suspended from the girdle, containing bits of jewelry, scissors, knife, a tiger's claw, for luck, rum bottle or sachet, and a tiny chess-board in gold silver.

Many of the women powder their faces and employ various other helps or hindrances to a good complexion, which they study at mirror toilet-stands. So that the Korean woman, even if she is not allowed the privilege of choosing her own husband nor of talking all she wants to upon her wedding day, is not denied all the feminine fads and follies so dear to her Occidental sister.

Strange as these marriage customs and ceremonies may appear to us, accustomed as we are to far different life in the New World, a fashionable wedding in Grace Church, New York, with its endless show and glitter, its flowers and music, would probably be an equal source of wonderment to our Korean sister, and she would likely think it all very meaningless and silly.

Easter

MORE than a mere coincidence is the time of the Easter festival. Those who have laid the forms of loved ones in the grave, and those who are approaching the end of their own lives, ask anxiously the question uttered long centuries ago by the patriarch: "If a man die, shall he live again?" Looking on the face of one on whom death has done its work, and noting the fearful havoc it has made, we may be forgiven for our faltering faith. It does not seem possible that the man can live again. Millions have passed out of that dread gate, and not one comes back, or utters a word audible to mortal ears. What reason have we to hope for anything beyond? To the anxious believer comes the assurance of Christ: "I am the resurrection and the life"; and after his words had been put to the proof, his declaration, "I am he that liveth and was dead; and behold, I am alive for evermore." As if to encourage our faith in that sublime fact, just at this season, nature is showing on every field and tree, the type of the truth we so long to believe. From the green shoots springing from the dead seeds in the ground; from the butterfly newly emerged from its chrysalis-grave, comes the kindly hint of nature bidding us take heart. The way to new and fuller and more abounding life, it tells us, is through death. "That which thou sowest is not quickened, except it die." Even He who is alive for evermore entered that life by the same gate as that toward which our steps are tending. He that liveth, was once dead. Nature unites with revelation in bidding us hope.

May we find a hope of immortality on the resurrection of Jesus? Does not our very belief in the divinity of his nature preclude us from inferring for ourselves a resurrection, which may have been a result of that union in him of the divine and the human? To this question the life we are now living must give the answer. If we have become by faith partakers of his nature, if he has risen from the dead in our lives, if the spirit that was in him animates our thoughts and actions—then we have a right to believe that, because he lives, we shall live also. The life of the vine is in the branches, and over that life, as the event we celebrate at Easter proves, death has no power. For ourselves, and for the loved ones gone before, we welcome the glad message that Easter brings, and sorrow not as those who have no hope.

The Mormon Problem

IT is a problem which affects the entire nation—men and women, married or single; and it aims more directly and vitally at the purity and integrity of American homes, and the happiness of American fathers, mothers and children, than any problem that has ever confronted us since the revolutionary war. These are the words of an outspoken American wife and mother, who addressed a public audience in New York City a few days ago, when the Mormon question was under discussion. They are fairly representative of the feeling that prevails in all parts of the country on this subject.

Congress has almost concluded its investigation. It has become painfully clear from the nature of the evidence, that the Mormon problem must be solved by such legislation as is necessary to preserve our national self-respect and to make for public decency. No half-way measures will meet the situation. The case of Senator Smoot has dwindled to the proportions of a mere incident. The real case is that of a State which is dominated by a cabal of political churchmen, who, by the admissions of their own leaders, bid defiance "to the laws of God and man"; who absolutely control its politics, choose and elect its Senators and Representatives, dictate to its courts and override the popular will by virtue of the powers of which they have defrauded the voters of Utah. It is the honest, reputable, law-abiding, God-fearing men and women of Utah who are now appealing to Congress to strike the blow which shall restore to them their rights and put away Utah's shame.

We cannot believe that they will be allowed to appeal in vain. We cannot believe that the Upper House of our national legislature will fail to grasp the great opportunity that is now presented to do the country a real service.

In the past, Congress has wrestled abortively with the Mormon question, chiefly in consequence of the difficulty of procuring evidence of the right sort upon which to base effective action. That difficulty is now removed. It is now open for Congress to enact such a law as will absolutely meet the necessities of the case, and which will satisfy the universal demand for the effective and permanent suppression of polygamy and its attendant indecencies, the recent revelations concerning which have awakened universal indignation. Let the Mormons believe what they will, they must be compelled to obey the law in the letter, if not in the spirit. Our Constitution tolerates freedom of conscience, but there should be no law on our statute books which makes it possible for any body of men to debauch a sovereign State and scandalize a nation as the President and Apostles of the Mormon Church, by their own confession, have done and are now doing.

Let Congress drive in the axe deeply and dig out polygamy, root and branch.

The Women of St. Louis

OUR people everywhere should honor the godly women of St. Louis. They have sounded the alarm, calling upon the friends of purity in every State of the Union to unite in a movement for the protection of those women, and especially the young girls, who contemplate visiting St. Louis during the coming World's Fair.

There is a peril threatening such visitors, the St. Louis women assure us, which is no mere dream of the imagination, but a very real danger. Evil disposed persons, of mercenary morals, have banded together in an organization which, if permitted to operate unchecked, would result in the wrecking of many a home, and the physical and moral ruin of thousands of innocent and unprotected young women. To meet this emergency, the St. Louis Women's Christian Association has organized a Reception Committee of its members—a large body of Christian workers—whose duty it will be to meet unescorted women visitors in Fair time, and to see that they do not fall into the snares set for them by the plotters. Each member of this Reception Committee will wear conspicuously, as a badge readily recognizable, a bow of blue ribbon at the waist, left side. Women visitors are to be met at the depots and elsewhere, and every such visitor will know that the wearer of the bow of blue ribbon is a friend, who seeks to do her a real service.

But to make this campaign of loving care a successful one, the women of St. Louis need the co-operation of good women throughout the whole country, and this fact is the basis of our present appeal to the mothers, sisters and daughters who read THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. We cordially invite their general co-operation in this simple plan: We propose to enroll in every town, village and hamlet, a Local Committee of godly women. To that Committee will be sent by mail the fullest explanation and all needful instructions how to act. Even if you may not intend to visit the Fair personally, there are no doubt some, perhaps many, in your neighborhood who purpose going there sometime during the coming summer. By organizing now, you and your associates will be enabled to help those intending visitors before they start, while on the train, while in St. Louis, and when returning home. The sole object is to assure them of proper protection and to see that they do not fall into unscrupulous hands.

Mrs. Margaret E. Sangster and her associates on the New York City Committee, are already actively at work in this matter. She invites you to send her your name and address if you wish to be represented in the movement for the protection of our girls who visit the Fair. On hearing from you, she will send to you by mail all needed instructions. Your committee, providentially, may be the means of saving many an unprotected girl from such perils as every right-thinking woman would blush even to name. Write at once to Look over the list and make your choice; Harper's Bazar, Leslie's Popular Monthly, Pearson's Success, Cosmopolitan, Woman's Home Companion, Little Folks, Watchdog of Christian Work, or Current Anecdotes, for Pastors.

Extra copies of the Red Letter Bible, $2; of the Leather Lined International Bible, $2; of the Red Letter New Testament, $1; of Pilgrim's Progress, or How I Worked My Way Around the World, or The Speaking Oak, $1 each. Extra magazines, 50 cents each.

A subscriber may take as many premiums, whether books or magazines, as he pleases.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD may be sent to one address, and each premium or magazine to a different address, without extra charge. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and magazines, if sent to a foreign country, require extra postage. All premiums are sent all charges prepaid. Our beautiful 15-color Butterfly Calendar for 1904 and 1905, goes with every subscription. Address to-day, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 92 Bible House, New York.

If you want to make sure of getting one of these encyclopedias under the above remarkable offer, it would be well to send your name and address on a postal card, stating that you are striving for a set. This offer is a splendid opportunity for ambitious young men and women to secure an up-to-date encyclopedia without any expense whatever, and by means of just a little commendable effort. This is a "do-good and get-good" proposition. Who will be the first to send in two subscribers? Remember that Monday, April 4, 1904, is the last mailing date.

An Important Decision

ONE of the most important legal decisions of our time was given on March 14, by the United States Supreme Court, in the case of the Northern Securities Merger. The question before the Court was whether the Northern Securities Company was an organization creating a monopoly, with the power to control and cripple a public necessity. The Company had been organized to take over and actually pool the earnings of the Great Northern Railway and the Northern Pacific Railway, and incidentally the Burlington and other lines. In the natural course of things, these lines would be competitors for the carrying business of the States through which they ran; but if their interests were united, as was done by pooling their earnings in the Northern Securities Company, competition between them would naturally cease. It was obvious that such an arrangement would benefit the lines concerned, but the public in the States affected, could be then at the mercy of a gigantic corporation, guarded by all her friends and acquaintances, but who was confronted with evidence that she had been for sixteen years a wife. An old schoolfellow, whom she had not seen since the year 1888, called upon her recently and told her that he was her husband. This she strenuously denied. But he asked her if she did not remember a certain day in February of that year, when he joined her as she was leaving school and went for a walk with her. She remembered the occasion very well, and also the fact that he had used the opportunity to make love to her and to plead with her to marry him. She was, as she well remembered, willing to be engaged to him, and she gave him her solemn promise to become his wife at some future time, but very soon afterwards, the youth's parents removed to Nebraska and took him with them. She had forgotten, until reminded of the fact, that in the course of their walk they had taken shelter from a shower in a railroad station, where the young man had recognized a friend, with whom they talked. He had told this friend the subject of their conversation, and had induced her to avow her affection morning the power of speech returned, as suddenly as it had left him. He is to be congratulated on so remarkable a recovery. His people, too, are doubtless rejoicing on being able to hear his voice again. It is always a loss to the Master's work when one of his representatives is silenced. Happily in this case the silence was due to a physical fall. Infinitely more grievous is it, when, as sometimes happens, it is due to a moral fall, and the Lord's people have to lament as did those of ancient times.

His watchmen are blind; they are all dumb dogs that cannot bark (Isa. 56:10)

A Teacher's Offer

A curious illustration of the difficulty of making redress for wrong was given in an address recently made by President Thomas Hunter, of the Normal College of New York. The question under discussion was the abolition of corporal punishment in the schools. President Hunter acknowledged that he had been an opponent of the abolition, believing that the "weak teach-with enormous privileges, which could charge what rates pleased for transportation between the Great Lakes and the Pacific. It was foreseen that if such a merging of interests could be effected in the case of two lines of railways, the time was not far distant when a still more extensive merger might be organized, which would control every mile of railroad in the country. The possibility was a serious one, involving the creation of a power inimical to the public interests, and constituting a public peril. The Government, therefore, decided to test the legality of the Northern Securities Company. It proceeded by charging the company with being a violation of the Sherman Anti-Trust law. There was no imputation of an evil purpose or design to the company, but it was contended that the power which was vested in it by the merger was dangerous to the public welfare, and that therefore it was precisely one of those trusts or monopolies prohibited by the Sherman Act. This contention of the government has been sustained by the decision now handed down by the Supreme Court. The decision, however, was only that of the majority. The view of the government was endorsed by Justices Harlan, Brown, Brewer, McKenna and Day, while the opposite opinion is held by Chief Justice Fuller and Justices White, Peckham and Holmes. The result, therefore, is that the Northern Securities Company is declared to be an illegal combination. It is recognized as one of those dangers which arise in every age, against which the public needs to be protected and which were denounced by the ancient prophet:

Woe unto them that join house to house, that lay field to field, till there be no room, that they may be placed alone in the midst of the earth (Isa. 5:8).

Singular Forgetfulness

A dispatch to the New York Times from Norristown, Pa., reports one of the most remarkable instances of forgetfulness on record. It was that of a lady who regarded herself as unmarried, and who had been so regarded by all her friends and acquaintances, but who was confronted with evidence that she had been for sixteen years a wife. An old schoolfellow, whom she had not seen since the year 1888, called upon her recently and told her that he was her husband. This she strenuously denied. But he asked her if she did not remember a certain day in February of that year, when he joined her as she was leaving school and went for a walk with her. She remembered the occasion very well, and also the fact that he had used the opportunity to make love to her and to plead with her to marry him. She was, as she well remembered, willing to be engaged to him, and she gave him her solemn promise to become his wife at some future time, but very soon afterwards, the youth's parents removed to Nebraska and took him with them. She had forgotten, until reminded of the fact, that in the course of their walk they had taken shelter from a shower in a railroad station, where the young man had recognized a friend, with whom they talked. He had told this friend the subject of their conversation, and had induced her to avow her affection

O foolish Galatians, who hath bewitched you, that ye should not obey the truth before whose eyes Jesus Christ hath been evidently set forth? (Gal. 3:1).

A Pastor Stricken Dumb

A press dispatch from St. Louis, Mo., reports a singular seizure and recovery in that city. It says that the pastor of a Methodist Episcopal Church has been completely dumb for more than five months. In October last, he was returning on a surface car from a pastoral visit and alighted near his home. Just as he was stepping off the car, it started suddenly and he was flung to the ground. He fell in a sitting posture, with a heavy shock, but with the assistance of a friend who was passing, he rose to his feet and reached the sidewalk. His friend led him home, and as he had a strange, strained feeling in his head and neck he, at once, retired to rest, hoping that in the morning it would have passed away. But the next day he was unconscious, and remained so for four days. When he regained his senses he was unable to utter a word. Specialists were summoned, who expressed the opinion that the shock of the fall had caused a clot to form on that part of the brain which controls the organs of speech. From that time until March 9, he could communicate with his family only by the sign language or by writing; but on that ers" needed the power to sustain their authority. His attitude, however, had changed, because if a child were wrongly punished by a flogging the mistake could not be rectified. A mark against an innocent boy could be erased if his innocence was afterwards proved, or overtime wrongly exacted could be made up, but for a blow there was no redress. He mentioned an instance in which that fact was brought home to him. He had punished two boys for an offence which he subsequently was convinced that they had not committed. In what way to make atonement to them for the mistake had been a problem to him. He saw no other way but to offer himself to take a flogging from their hands. He did so, but the boys laughed at the idea of flogging their teacher and so there had been no redress. It was one of those wrongs, of which life is so full, that can never be righted. How many men there have been, who have submitted voluntarily to suffering as this teacher offered to do, and have undergone torture as they do to this day in India, in the hope that by their suffering they may make atonement for their sins! To all such how welcome is the assurance that the Apostle gives of forgiveness through Christ.

Whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation, through faith in his blood to declare his righteousness for the remission of sins that are past (Rom. 3:25).

BRIEF NOTES

Opportunities for Christian missionary work in Persia are multiplying. The Church Missionary Society has issued a call for more missionaries for that field. It has stations in Ispahan, Yazd, Kirman, and Sheraz.

The agitation against Roman Catholic Orders in France has driven many monks and nuns into other countries. Over six thousand have settled in England. New convents to the number of forty-seven have been founded in that country.

The Total Abstinence movement in Germany is making solid progress. In a comparatively brief period, 871 books, by 413 different authors, have been published, advocating total abstinence. Several influential journals and magazines also have espoused the cause. Temperance societies of various kinds have been organized throughout the Empire, and are enrolling members.

ASTRONOMY OF THE BIBLE

By PROF. LEWIS SWIFT, F. R. A. S.

SECOND ARTICLE — THE WORLD'S FIRST DAY. "And the evening and the morning were the first day." GENESIS 1:

THERE probably is not in the Bible a stranger expression, or one apparently destitute of meaning, and yet containing a world of significance, than this. Mark well the language, the evening taking precedence of the morning. Did the Bible reader ever reflect and ask himself why it is so worded, which every rising and setting sun disputes? Had you, Mr. Editor, or I written it, we would have said the morning and the evening were the first day; but had Moses so written it, astronomy and the Bible would be antagonistic, and astronomy the victor. Here arises the question, Did Moses write it? I answer, No. He held the pen, but the great I Am wielded it, to announce a vital fact that was not to be deciphered till astronomy should unlock the mystery lurking in it.

At that time, and for thousands of years thereafter, everybody supposed the earth to be flat instead of a sphere, situated in the centre of the universe, and without motion of any kind; and that all the heavenly bodies revolved around it as a centre. The passage alludes to motion somewhere. The word day as used here does not mean our day of twenty-four hours, nor a day of a year's length, as used in a few places in the Bible, but a day of unknown length. The root of the Hebrew word translated day, means a ring or circle, something that has no end. So tenaciously did the world hold to the dogma that the earth was flat, in Moses' day, that had he stated in plain language that the earth was a globe and revolved around the sun, and every day turned bottom upwards, the Bible would have been trampled under foot as a teacher of absurdities. Later came astronomy, and told a marvelous and unexpected story. Instead, therefore, of the earth being at rest, it has twelve motions, a few of which I will briefly allude to as bearing on the subject of the text:

1. Motion around the sun once a year.
2. Revolution of its orbit in 109,800 years.
3. Motion of translation. The sun, like a mighty locomotive, is rushing through space, dragging all the planets, including the earth and the satellites and periodic comets, at the rate of about twelve miles a second, going we know not where. If in a straight line, which is probable, we are going nowhere; but if in a curve, which is possible, we are going somewhere, but where is beyond the power of man to tell. But the inference is strong that the motion is orbital, revolving around some mighty world, of which our sun in comparison is a pigmy, requiring millions of years to complete one revolution. In view of such a stupendous idea, well may we inquire where are we going. Who will be here to follow our footsteps when that mighty cycle shall end, when, as one astronomer expressed it, the great bell of eternity will strike one. In rushing through space at such a rate, filled with countless millions of worlds, is there no danger of collisions? No, God is at the helm.
4. The earth wobbles, like the wobbling of a boy's spinning-top just before it falls, when both ends wobble; but it takes 25,800 years to make one wobble. It is called by astronomers the precession of the equinoxes. This motion, too slow to be noticed by the naked eye, in less than 400 years produces some wonderful changes in the appearance of the heavens as the centuries come and go, giving the earth a succession of pole stars, and a dozen times during the period there will be none. The earth's axis in our day is said to point to the pole star; but it does not, never did, nor never will. In about 200 years it will pass the pole star within twenty-seven minutes of it; but in a thousand years or so it will be too far from the star to be called a pole star—there will be none. But after the lapse of a certain number of centuries another star will be a pole star, and then again none. In 12,500 years Alpha Lyra, one of the brightest stars in the sky, will be a pole star, but it will be some six degrees from the pole; but the people will have to call it so. In some 20,000 years Alpha Draconis will be exactly a pole star, and is the only one that ever is. In almost 26,000 years the polar point will be where it now is. There is no south polar star now. As the earth wobbles it rocks as if in a gigantic rocking chair, called nutation.

5. The earth rotates on its axis once a day, and the question arises which way? Astronomers say from west to east, or, as Moses puts it, from the evening towards the morning, the only motion he describes, and the only one that was necessary to convince the world that the earth was not flat, but round. I hope the reader will see the significance of the divine statement, which took the world thousands of years to find out. The rotation of the earth on its axis is the only undeviatingly accurate motion known to man. In thousands of years it has not deviated a single second. It is a clock that never needs winding up, for it never runs down.

The earth, now our home and soon to be our grave, rushing in its orbit round the sun, at the rate of ninety miles a second, as noiseless as the quietude of an infant's sleep. Its surface at the equator is rotating at a velocity of 1,026 miles an hour from west to east, or, as Moses says, from the evening towards the morning.

The ancients had no idea of the size of the earth, whether flat or round, or what it rested on, yet Job speaks of a circle of the sea, and says he hangeth the earth on nothing. Copernicus, 1473-1543, was the first man who dared attack the flat earth delusion, and proved by overwhelming arguments that the sun, and not the earth, was centre.

The mean diameter of the earth is 7,912 miles, and therefore curves eight inches to the mile. It, however, is not a globe, properly speaking, but is what mathematicians call an oblate spheroid, caused when it was a liquid condition by heat, by its rapid rotation, that is, it has an equatorial protuberance extending entirely around the earth, commencing at each pole, growing thicker and thicker, till at the equator it is thirteen or fourteen miles in thickness, making the earth at the equator twenty-six one-half miles larger than from pole to pole. The attractions of the sun and moon, this protuberant matter, produces several of the two motions alluded to elsewhere. Mathematicians have proved, that taking into consideration the earth's diameter, its period of rotation and its density, its sphericity is just what it ought to be when in a liquid condition. Yes, this earth was in its infancy, a mass of liquid fire, which is not cooled off yet. At a depth of seven miles, everything is at a red heat, and at thirty miles down, every known substance would be melted. But what is thirty miles compared with the 3,950 miles to its centre. We are living on a shell, only four miles from where every creature would die.

How long a time has elapsed since the surface was molten mass is not even surmisable. If we ever knew it will be revealed to us from the other side, after the golden chain that binds us here is severed, and we stand face to face with Him.

Whose head with radiant glory crowned Whose lips with grace overflow, who, if necessary for his ransomed to know, will teach us.

The mighty universe, of which our little home is part, is the offspring of one mind of which chance has nothing to do. The thought fills me with emotions too deep for words to utter, when I think how nicely the Creator has fitted it up for our enjoyment; a little of among the countless millions that fill immensity. I illustrate, I will allude to but a single one—the atmosphere, to which the mass of mankind seldom give thought.

This gaseous envelope, extending to a height of nearly fifty miles, is exactly adapted for animals to breathe; fires to burn, plants to grow, so transparent that mountains can be seen through it fifty miles away, its vibrating qualities giving audible speech, its weight lifting up the clouds that give us shade and rain, and the beautiful snow. There is beauty everywhere.

It sparkles on the ocean wave, it glitters in the dew,
We see it in the glorious sky, and in the floweret's hue.
If so much loveliness is sent to grace our earthly home,
How beautiful, how beautiful, must be the world to come!

LEWIS SWIFT.

A ROYAL GARDEN PARTY IN TOKIO

IN a letter from Tokio, Japan, published in the New York Sun, there appears a charming description of a garden party given by the Empress in the palace grounds.

Guests walk about. When tired of looking at the flowers, they look at one another, and they are worth the looking. The background of all, is the sombre, frock-coated, silk-hatted Japanese gentlemen—the most interesting of all, too, perhaps, could one but read the faces as one thinks of their history; a few Japanese women, noticeably few, perhaps because foreign dress is now prescribed for this occasion, perhaps because they have not even yet acquired much fondness for large social gatherings.

In the foreground are foreigners, men and women, perhaps two hundred, of many nations. Most of the women wear light colors, white, blue, gray or green. More than half of the men are in uniform, some from the different armies, but more from the navies of the six different nations whose ships lie at anchor down in the bay—Japan, France, Germany, Italy, England and the United States. They are all frock-coated with gold or silver buttons, some with epaulets, some without, as their Admirals have ordered. All, from the shy young German ensign, to the resplendent English Vice-Admiral, look interested and happy.

A little music is played softly by a military band, hidden somewhere just far enough away. The music grows fuller, the Japanese national air is recognized, and now, without knowing exactly how it happens—although the deferential court chamberlains, with their chrysanthemum buttons, could explain, perhaps—the guests find themselves formed into two groups with an aisle between them.

A procession is seen at a distance, approaching slowly. A little, dark-haired lady leads the way. Her figure is slender and youthful, her carriage graceful, her face, that of middle age. Her gown is of violet—the imperial color—brocaded with chrysanthemums—the royal flower. It is the Empress, in her garden, among her flowers. Every one bows—the Japanese profoundly—to the ground, almost.

Behind her, come the Princesses and ladies of the court, then the Diplomatic Corps. First of these, the British Minister, and, leaning lightly upon his arm, the most beautiful vision of the day—a tall, graceful, dark-haired woman, with the mystery of India in her dark eyes—the wife of the Indian Maharajah, who walks just behind them. The rest of the Diplomatic Corps follows, the picturesque Chinese among them, and after them, every one, a long, long line, winding as the path way winds, while the Empress leads the way.

At the last a third open square is reached where, under a bamboo shelter, a long table is bountifully spread with good things, such as gladden men's palates, while outside of the lawn are chairs and a multitude of little tables. The Empress goes to a little space left at one end of the long table. A few preparations are made to her, the Empress standing through them all.

These over, every one seats himself, is refreshed with tea, coffee or an ice, all served in quite the foreign fashion, with spoons and saucers. After about half an hour the Empress takes her leave. Everybody bows a before, the Japanese very low. Each man looks at his neighbor and realizes that the fête is over.

OUR WORK IN MACEDONIA

SO much has been printed of late in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD regarding the relief work among the refugees from Macedonia who have fled to Bulgaria, that we give space this week to reports of work in Western Macedonia, where the devastation and suffering were most appalling. These reports are compiled from the notes of a faithful worker in the field, who with his wife is now at the very heart of the relief work in Macedonia. The letters give the reader some right idea of the appalling misery now prevailing there.

There is no question that many peasants in the Ohrida region especially, must have starved to death, and it not been for the timely arrival of funds, first from England. The generous response of the people of that land to the cry of Macedonia's need has completely revolutionized the feelings of the people toward her. The Christians of the Monastir region are hopeful that that vilayet will fall to England, on the division of territory for the proposed department of the gendarmerie.

In January, a ruffle of excitement was caused by the arrival of the dragoman and servant of the Austrian assessor. The dragoman is said to be an Albanian, a professor of languages in Vienna. His chief when he arrives—is to be accompanied by a consul and a vice-consul. Apparently, none in Monastir puts faith in the sincerity of the two reform powers.

The political horizon is exceedingly interrogative. Hilmi Pasha and his two Christian adjuncts seem to be enjoying life in Salonica. Hilmi gives dinners and the Austrian furnishes amusing stories. If these gentlemen would come to Monastir vilayet, accompanied by the fez-wearing Albanian general and his European assistants, each in his own uniform, and if all would work on the reform scheme, I believe the revolutionary committees would gladly be quiet. As to the renewal of the revolution by Macedonian bands, I think it is settled that there will be no outbreak in the armed districts of the Monastir vilayet.

It requires great faith to believe that the reforms will amount to anything, and that the spring will pass without bloody conflicts in some portions of Macedonia. Even now the Northern Albanians are in open revolt, and the government is sending troops there in feverish haste. Singular rumor is afloat that Russia, having her hands quite full in the Far East, will yield her place in the near East, at the side of Austria, to England.

This rumor were fact, one might guarantee that no Bulgarian bands would stir.

Grateful mention has been made in these columns of the sums received in aid from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund, at various times, both in Monastir and Salonica, for distribution in Macedonia. His joy in receiving this aid to alleviate the suffering all about him, leads our informant to exclaim, "For the cultivation of real Christian benevolences, everybody ought to read that paper."

Lady Thompson reports thirty-four patients in the relief hospital at Kastoria, and many applicants for whom there is no room. The authorities forbid the use of an additional house, which Mr. Brailsford, of the London Daily News Fund, had rented for the purpose. The most they will grant is the toleration of our present quarters in Kastoria and Ochrida. Lady Thompson recently visited the Turkish hospital, and found it remarkably clean, well ventilated, etc., yet the twelve patients in the large building were fairly forced to enter. The authorities brought them in on donkeys from nearby villages. Perhaps it gets on their nerves to have soldiers standing guard over their beds, or possibly they long for the tender love and sympathy of woman.

Miss Durham is taking hold, vigorously, at Resna, where she is in charge of the relief work.

A man is here now pleading for flour. He was an inn-keeper. The khan was burned, but he escaped from the flames through a shower of Turkish bullets. He has four bad bullet scars on his body. Another peasant asks me to help him prepare a petition to the Governor-General for the recovery of a valuable horse, which was borrowed three months ago by a captain of artillery. Expectant women come for baby gear. These I refer to my good wife, who usually warms them up with hot coffee before bringing out the diminutive

Messrs. Haskell and Graham, in canvassing the Kirchovo and Demirhissar villages, noticed one hundred and eighty authentic cases of outrage by soldiers, many of the victims being small girls. Probably less than half the actual cases are made public. It will take more than paper reforms to subdue the spirit of rebellion in that quarter of the Monastir vilayet.

£5,000 sterling telegraphed from the Macedonian Relief Fund, London, and $1,500 checked from the Boston committee, reached us lately.

Five bales of clothing and one of blankets from England arrived one day lately—just the articles needed for hospitals and orphanage. A careful assortment will be made, and portions will be sent to Ochrida and to Kastoria, and a portion retained here for the orphans we plan to gather in the near future. There is not a useless article in the whole lot. The generous gift of cloth previously received has all been distributed to very grateful recipients.

Miss Durham reports much sickness and many deaths among children, especially in the Presba vilayet, and Mr. McGregor, British Vice-consul, despatched a physician to the region. Miss Durham will take Mrs. Brailsford's work. The latter has done noble work at Ochrida, and there will be bitter weeping when she leaves.

The orphan girls in the mission school at Monastir are doing nicely. We have not yet succeeded in renting a suitable building for an orphanage. If we were authorized by one or more of the funds to purchase a house and large yard, which are available, for about £500, that would be the very best thing. Children are crying to come to us. Our school is full.

Six carloads of relief flour have come from Serbia. It seems quite probable that we shall have funds enough to feed the hungry peasants to the end of March. But then a very large sum will be needed for oxen, farming implements and seed, and for house building.

Lady Thompson telegraphs that Miss Bruce is very sick at Kastoria. The physician pronounced it a case of abortive typhoid. One of the Sisters of Mercy was similarly prostrated at the same time. Both are convalescing satisfactorily and Miss Bruce hopes to start for England in a few days. Mr. and Mrs. Brailsford hastened to the assistance of Lady Thompson, and three more Sisters came from Salonica. The physician sent to the Presba villages vaccinated some 600 peasants, but did not find more than ten people down with smallpox. A surgeon despatched to Ochrida, at request of Miss Durham, performed twenty operations in two days at the hospital.

Mr. Graham's thirty-seven villages in the Kirchovo region contain the most ragged people of all, and they live in abject fear of their Muslim neighbors. The other day a villager who was coming for a promised blanket, was murdered on the road by a Turk, who shot also at the son of the deceased. Mr. Graham reports that the Servian agents who came there to distribute flour, begged him to leave five villages to their tender mercies, as they had food for them. It turned out that they did not go near the said villages, but doled out all their flour to so-called Servians in a so-called Servian village. I have tried in vain to have an understanding with the Servian agents here, who began giving out flour in the city to our regular recipients, at the rate of six pounds a head. Now the agents are summoned to Serbia, and it is not known if more flour will arrive. We are bidding for all the government grain—1,500 kilos—at Resna, which is sold at auction. In a few days more we shall have finished the distribution of blankets.

swaddling suits, the materials for which are provided from Miss Muriel White's fund. Mrs. Bond spends one whole day a week in cutting out these garments, and her sewing-circle meets for half a day at the chapel, while a few women do sewing at their homes, all without pay, of course. And here is a Jewess, whose husband, a village storekeeper, was carried off by an insurgent band and killed, after the store had been destroyed. Yesterday a poor peasant brought a petition, endorsed by his village, setting forth that he is reduced from comfort to beggary by the burning of his house and belongings. His wife was shot by the soldiers, and driven back into the flames and perished, leaving five small children. There are some of the claims that are false, and many that do not come within the scope of relief work. It is the refusing that tries one's soul.

PROOF OF LIFE

Spiritual Life Manifesting Itself in Conduct

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

MANY of the conversions with which we have been familiar for many years past have filled our churches with impotent folk—blind, halt, withered—who are always waiting, not on the Lord that they may renew their strength (Isa. 40:31), but “for the moving of the water” (John 5:3). They are spiritually in the same case as the impotent man who had been for thirty-eight years unable to help himself or others. Why is this? Because the conversions have not been thorough. There has not been the deep “repentance toward God,” which has led to a complete change of life toward man also; there has not been a faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ which has taken him as the guide and power of a life, the spring of which is “Christ in you the hope of glory” (Col. 1:27); and, consequently, the confession of Christ before men has been imperfect and powerless. Things have come to such a pass that, in a large majority of cases, one has to ask whether such an one is converted or not.

When the physical life of a man is at such a low ebb that it is necessary to inquire whether he still lives, what good can such a life be to him or to anyone else? Yet this is the kind of life which exists among some of our church members! Wherever there is spiritual life in a church, there is a testimony to the world. Life must have air, and light, and movement. We commit the dead to darkness, silence, immovability. Wherever the life of Christ in a church does not make itself felt, it is because it has very little existence. Spiritual life must be aggressive in order to exist. “If thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus,” is as indispensable a condition as “If . . . thou shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved” (Rom. 10:9). Therefore, if thou shalt not believe in thine heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt not be saved; and if thou shalt not confess him with thy mouth, thou shalt not be saved either, “for with the heart man believeth unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation.” O how many there are who never confess him before the world! Are such really saved at all?

Peter was the first of the twelve chosen apostles to confess Christ, and in spite of his many failings, he it was who was the chosen instrument at Pentecost to confess his Lord when the three thousand repented, believed and confessed Jesus to be the Christ. The Lord Jesus had come with his disciples into the towns of Casarea Philippi. This was to the north of the Lake of Gennesaret, but southeast of Damascus. Why should our Lord have gone thus outside of the borders of Galilee? He was teaching and training his disciples; they were to be his future witnesses, and he must sound them as to how far they understood and recognized in him the coming Messiah. “By the way he asked his disciples, Whom do men say that I am? And they answered, John the Baptist; but some say Elias; and others, One of the Prophets. And he saith unto them, But whom say ye that I am? And Peter answereth and saith unto him, Thou art the Christ” (Mark 8:27-29; Matt. 16:16, adds, “the Son of the living God”).

This was the testimony which was to be committed to these twelve men, and it is committed to every true believer. The apostle John says of the contents in his Gospel: “These are written that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing, ye might have life through his name” (John 20:31). It was this very testimony of Peter which God used to bring so many to believe. “Now therefore,” he said, “let all the house of Israel know assuredly that God hath made this same Jesus whom ye have crucified both Lord and Christ” (Acts 2:36).

The Two Standard

Reasons for Choosing the Unseen Objects of Life Rather Than the Visible*

WHEN the Apostle John warned his readers, at the close of his life, against the three modes of approach which the enemy adopts, he was rendering them an inestimable service. He must have seen many fall, and he wanted to save those who were liable to fall. Like an experienced general, who had been in many campaigns, he knew the enemy's tactics and desired to put his friends on their guard. Easter was a citadel that might be captured, or with diligence and vigilance might be held for Christ. Lest they be taken by surprise, he tells them where the weak points are, so that those might be carefully guarded. They are: the lust of the flesh, physical pleasure; the lust of the eyes, or the desire for rich and worldly possessions, and the pride of life, or ambition, a love of honor and power. One of these avenues and sometimes by all three, temptation comes, and he who at first was consecrating himself to the higher life is led away from his first love. There has been a change in the conflict since the Apostle's time, and these approaches still need to be guarded.

The Apostle had been preaching the duty of a loving disposition. He, more than any of the apostolic circle, had absorbed Christ's injunction to love men, even enemies. Love was to be cultivated; as Paul had insisted, it was the greatest of virtues and would survive others, but it must be directed to the right objects. If it was spent on worldly things it was wasted. Why? A conclusive answer, in which many others are included, the Apostle gives in the fact that, “The world passeth away.” Those who have made worldly objects their aim must therefore inevitably suffer loss. If they failed in their pursuit, or if they succeeded, the end would be alike disastrous. Therefore he urges them to set their affections on things which are permanent. Not only would these objects remain, when the world itself had passed away, but the man himself would survive, “He that doeth the will of God abideth forever.”

The lust of the flesh. The curate of a parish in the poorest part of New York was summoned, one night last summer, to a foul lodging-house to see a dying man. The room in which he found him was dirty and ill-smelling. He bent over the bed and finding the sufferer still sensible, but evidently very near death, he lost no time in pointing him to Christ. Every minute was precious, and his teaching was direct and simple. Presently, the dying man turned his face toward his visitor and said: “Walter, don't you know me?” The light from the dirty lamp was so dim and the face so contorted with pain that the curate could not recognize him. “Have you forgotten Hugh, your college roommate?” asked the dying man. “Forgotten? No, but you are so changed, and you are the last man I should have expected to see in such a place as this.” A shiver passed through the sufferer's body and he said, “You can do me no good, Walter, I know all you would say. You warned me when I began my career of vice, but it did no good. I was bent on going my own way. I have sent for you that you may see the wreck and warn others. Make me a text, Walter. Tell every young man you know, what I was, and how I came to be the mass of corruption and the friendless pauper I am. Perhaps some may be saved by my story. Don't spare me. I am lost, but it will be some relief, even to me, if through the use you can make of my history as you know it, others are saved.” He could say no more, and in a few minutes the silence of the laboring breath told his friend that he was dead.

HER EASTER GIFT

BY

MARGARET E. SANGSTER

MIRIAM CLOSTER had watched her lilies all winter. It had been such a severe season that more than ordinary care had been needed to keep flowers from freezing, and more than on night, in slippers and bathrobe, she had sought the library between twelve o'clock and dawn, to be sure the lilies were safe.

Now, Easter was at hand, and she had a perfect glory of nowy bloom to carry to church, and her heart beat with gladness. As chairman of the Flower Committee, it was her duty to solicit palms and plants for the Easter decorations, but she always brought more flowers than anyone else, and took no little satisfaction in their superb beauty.

Miriam Kloster had another offering besides her lilies, for the Easter service. She had a contralto voice of rare compass and rich melody, and in the choir no one was more prized than she, for her training had been fine, and her singing touched the heart.

The young pastor depended on Miriam for many services of unselfish love. The Christian Society looked to her as its virtual leader, and whoever else was derelict, Miriam came up to the expectations of those who admired her personality, and recognized at its worth her executive ability and her remarkable talent for management.

It was with some regret that Miriam heard the pastor, the Sunday before Easter, request the children of the Sunday School to bring gifts as offerings of love on Easter morning.

"I wish," she said to her mother, "that Mr. Bennet had consulted me before he told the children to do that. Now we'll have a lot of queer-looking spindling plants, in all sorts of pots, and the artistic effect will be spoiled."

"Oh, you'll get along, dear," said the comfortable, easy-going mother. "Never fear. You will have your lilies, and nothing can spoil them."

Just one day before Easter, there was a fire in Bellville, and the Closters' home, by one of those freaks which every conflagration shows, was burned to the ground. The Closters seemed by a malign fate to have been caught in an eddy of the gale, and absolutely to have fallen in a flaming shower on the roof of the beautiful Kloster home.

For ten years that home had been the show-place of Bellville. It stood in the midst of its wide grounds, an ample and ornate house, white-pillared, with a veranda that was as a summer parlor, and a tower whence one could gaze, on a clear day, for many miles. Fully insured as to its value as real estate, its loss could not be made up in money to those who had so much enjoyed it ever since it was built, and who had filled it with objects of art and elegance brought from lands across the sea.

No insurance could pay Miriam Kloster for her lilies. Burnt and blackened, the library and its treasures had bowed before the devouring fire, and tongues of scarlet flame had licked up the lilies.

Easter morning found the Closters temporarily homeless, though homes were open to them. Mr. Kloster, a capable, freehanded American, public-spirited and zealous for the good of his town, was as distressed at the havoc in the burnt district as at the loss in his own hearthstone.

Not so, Miriam. She lay on the bed in her Cousin Caroline's cottage, a heap of girlish misery, sobbing involuntarily, and refusing to be consoled.

"My lilies! my lilies!" she moaned. "My whole winter's work gone in ten minutes!"

"Miriam," pleaded Cousin Caroline, "don't take it so hard. There will be other years and other lilies, darling. Get up and wash your face, and come to the church. We must rearrange the flowers now, and hope that somebody besides you has been raising something white and sweet for this day. We have the children's offerings, you know, and—Miriam, you sing in the quartette, and haven't you a solo? How can you sing if you don't conquer your hysteria?"

Miriam tried to stop weeping, but her tears still flowed. Yet something must be done. To cry over burnt flowers, was almost as futile as to cry over spilled milk.

"Think of my singing a resurrection song when my heart lies in the ashes," exclaimed Miriam, tragically. "Somebody must take my place."

"Nobody can, dear child. We have got to do our day's work, let happen what may. There is no other course, and if it be the Lord's appointment for the day to test us with disappointment, why, then, that must be borne. Come, Miriam, show yourself strong, and try not to lose the Easter blessing. It might have been worse."

"I don't see how."

"You are all spared," said Cousin Caroline. "All spared, and together."

Miriam glanced at her cousin's black dress and crepe veil, and she remembered the graves in the cemetery, two of them hallowed since last Easter, where her cousin's dearest ones slept. All at once she realized that she was extremely selfish, and that in her wish to honor God's house on Easter Day, there had been a mingling of the evil leaven of vanity and pride.

...I done raised it fo' Easter,' answered Sophy."

They were early at the church. The pastor met them at the door.

"My dear Miss Kloster," he said, "I am so sorry. Your lovely home gone. It is a strange dispensation. But I am glad to see that you can smile."

It was a wan flicker of a smile, but it was brave, and with it came a lifting of the heart. So true it is that if we try to look cheery, the cheer follows the look.

The children had each brought a plant. There were geraniums, azaleas, carnations, roses, a lavish display after all, against a background of palms and ferns. And presently, tottering under the weight of a superb lily, its carved bells pure as the drifted snow, came in an old colored woman, bent with years and infirmities, Sophy Newcome her name.

"Why, Sophy!" exclaimed Miriam, "where did you get this splendid lily?"

"I done raised it, Missy; I done raised it fo' Easter."

I fatched it along; it's all I've got, but I want it to praise de Lord on Easter Day. Fo' he hab broken, and he hab bind up, and bressed be his holy name."

"Sophy!" and Miriam's voice trembled, "I love you for bringing this lily. It shall stand in the very front of everything, and you shall sit in our pew, where you can see and hear, and enjoy the Easter service."

"Not in yo' pew, honey; Sophy is content in de back o' the church, honey."

"Sophy, to please me," said Miriam, "sit in my place, in my mother's pew, to-day, where I would be if I had not to sing in the choir. I want to look at you and at your lily at the same time."

Mr. Bennet, the minister, had been drawn to Miriam Kloster for months, but had resisted the spell that attracted him, chiefly because he feared a certain arrogance and hardness, evident, he thought, in the way she controlled and led things. Being a man who liked to lead and control, he was not sure that he would be wise in wooing that sort of wife.

This morning, Miriam appealed to him as she never had before. He had not expected her to be quite so calm, after the experiences of the fire. With all Bellville, he had known how she had toiled for her Easter lilies. The traces of tears on her cheek, and the smile that struggled to her face touched his heart. As he went into his study before going into the pulpit, he prayed as always for help that day, but a little petition blended with the prayer, for the sweet girl who seemed to him so regnant in her gentle womanhood, regnant over anything petty and small.

"A big nature! Lord, bless her," said Mr. Bennet.

The little scene when she had arranged Old Sophy's votive offering in the place of honor, and had led Sophy to Mr. Kloster's pew, had most of all charmed Mr. Bennet.

"She will make a good wife for a minister! A good wife for me!"

He put the thought out of his mind, as he read the Scriptures, and went through the opening portions of the service. When the glorious songs of Easter resounded through the church, he heard Miriam's tones, vibrant, sweet, insistent, and when she sang her solo, "I know that my Redeemer liveth," tears came suddenly to his eyes.

"Cousin Caroline," Miriam said on Easter night, "it's been a happy day after all. I could not carry my lilies to church, but I carried something else, and made that my gift, and I found a blessing."

"What did you carry, Miriam?"

"My pride, my self-will. I laid them down under Sophy Newcome's lily."

"Long ago," answered Cousin Caroline, "I learned the lesson that only as we rise from the graves of our own conquered besetting sins, can we know the gladness of the Resurrection. The Lord is Risen, indeed, when we, in our hearts, without a single complaint, accept his will. So is every day our Easter day."

With something too much of confidence, the Rev. Ralph Bennet at first preferred his suit to Miriam Kloster. She was not easily won. Yet, a year later, he helped her dress the church with lilies she had watched and tended, and, during Easter week, they stood together in the glory of the Easter flowers, and pledged each other loyal love, till death should them part.

"My love," he said, as the carriage whirled them away after the ceremony, "you will always be to me as a lily of Easter."

Examining the Corner-stone

Peter Confesses the Christ ✧ By DR. and MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFT

AFTER leaving Bethsaida, Jesus and his disciples traveled northwards by the roads on the east of the river Jordan until they reached the town now known as Banias, near the base of Mount Hermon. In full view, would be the city of Caesarea, the position of which, on its rocky eminence, may have suggested to Christ that figure of which the Roman Catholic Church has made so much—the church built on the rock.

Illustration and Application

The newspapers recently told of the tearing down of an old "Non-Sectarian Church," in whose corner-stone it was expected some curious and valuable papers would be found. The leading men of the town stood by as the workmen neared the corner-stone, all expecting to see in it some old Bible, some ancient records of the church and of the town, some early newspaper, and the like. At last the corner-stone was uncovered, and it was found hollow and empty. There was nothing in it.

So in this lesson we gather about the corner-stone of Roman Catholicism, and truth compels us to say, "with malice toward none, with charity for all," that it is hollow and empty. There is nothing in it. Roman Catholics tell us that Christ constituted Peter the first pope when he said, "Thou art Peter, and on this rock I will build my church, and I will give thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and whatsoever thou shalt find on earth shall be found in heaven, and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven." One-half the lesson to-day may well be devoted to showing, once for all, that there is nothing in this claim.

When Pope Leo XIII. died recently, many Protestants, especially politicians and merchants, acting on that proverb of mistaken kindness, "Nothing but good of the dead," which often leads to nothing but injustice to the living, seemed to forget why they were Protestants in an effort to display their liberality. Even the star-chamber election of his successor, so unlike anything in the New Testament, did not bring back the scales of justice to their true poise, nor will most people see the contrast to Peter's simplicity in the pope's treatment for gout, and so our Protestant boys and girls, playing with agreeable Roman Catholic schoolmates, whose presence added to political considerations, hampers school-teachers in presenting the facts of history that show the errors and crimes of Romanism, need to be taught in their own Sunday Schools why they should kindly but firmly reject its claims, especially its corner-stone.

Let it be noted that this lesson story itself shows plainly that Peter, even after he was called a "rock" and given the power of the "keys," was not infallible. When Christ spoke of his approaching sufferings on the Cross, Peter reproved him because, like modern popes, he had mistaken ideas of "temporal power," which, misunderstanding the prophecies, he expected immediately for Christ, with a premier's share in it for himself. If Peter was a pope, his first "bull" was one against the atonement—surely a "bull" in the Irish sense: "Far be it from thee Lord." If he was the first pope, the new title he received from Christ was "Leo," in the sense of the "roaring lion that goeth about seeking whom he may devour," for Christ called him "Satan," and bade him get behind him, rather than come beside him as a vicegerent. Peter had shown the same selfish spirit of political ambition as Satan in the temptation, when he suggested that Christ should conquer quickly by force, rather than slowly by love, all the kingdoms of the world.

The power of the keys, here seemingly given to Peter alone, is in another passage given to all the apostles (Matthew 18: 18). When we understand the passage, we shall see that this power is given to all who will receive it. "Keys" are in the Bible a symbol of power, just as the sceptre is the symbol of authority. The terms, "kingdom of God" and "kingdom of heaven," all through the Bible, refer not to heaven above, but to the doing of God's will, as in heaven, so on earth, in fulfilment of the Lord's Prayer. The "kingdom of heaven" is the "kingdom of God," and the "kingdom of God" is present allegiance to God. The passage about the keys interpreted by the Bible signal code is the promise of Christ to every one: "I will give to you in your life of allegiance to God, such a deliverance not only from the guilt, but also from the power and the very love of sin, that you shall forbid yourself what God forbids, and permit yourself only what God permits."

Now let us turn to the main reliance of the Roman Catholics, their very corner-stone: "Thou art Peter, and on this rock will I build my Church." This passage must be interpreted in harmony with history, and with other Scripture references to the rock foundations of the Church. Who can read even the New Testament history of the first century and say that Peter was even the chief apostle? At Pentecost, and for a few years thereafter, Peter is the apostolic leader, though James, head of the Church at Jerusalem, is more like a bishop. In a sense, Peter opens the church door to the Gentiles in the home of Cornelius. But, presently, Paul appears, and in every respect towers above Peter. He writes much more of the Bible and preaches much more widely than Peter. That Paul went to Rome and built up the Church there, no one denies, but there is no proof that Peter ever went there at all. John, too, wrote more of the New Testament than Peter, and had far greater influence then with his hundred years of life, and is to-day more in-fluent than Peter as a builder of churches and character. Peter encourages us by his very fallibility, but in himself he was but a tumbling mountainside rock till Pentecost, long after this lesson scene, gave him rock-firm God trust. The Bible passage that interprets Christ's words to Peter, "On this rock will I build my church," is this: "Built on the foundation of apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone" (Ephesians 2: 20). Peter, as the first to confess the divinity of Christ, proves himself the first of the "living stones" he himself speaks of in his epistles to be laid in the "foundation of apostles and prophets," but it is only representatively in his act of confessing the divinity of Christ that he is related to the corner-stone of the Church, which is the divinity of Christ confessed. The image of Jupiter in Rome, which has been made over into an image of Peter, and placed in St. Peter's, where its toe, first worn by pagan adoration, is now kissed in the idolatry of "baptized heathenism," is strangely contradictory to the transfiguration scene of the next lesson, where heavenly saints, when tabernacles, in which they were to be worshiped, were suggested, disappeared from sight that "Jesus only" might be adored and proclaimed.

This brings us to the practical half of the lesson, which every teacher should guard against the encroachments of the controversial part. Indeed, for the little ones, and where revival interest prevails, the controversial part may well be excluded altogether, in order to develop what has ever been the open secret of the Church's growth, the open confession of Christ. Some talk of a "profession of faith," but the Bible term is "confession of faith." Some convey the idea that they only should speak for Christ who can "edify," but the Bible calls us all to "testify." Not everybody can be a teacher, but who is incapable of being a witness of what he has seen and heard? And every witness for Christ adds a stone, if only a little one, to the sure foundations on which Christ is rearing the Church of God.

"Believe and Receive and Confess Him"

LET HIM TAKE UP HIS CROSS AND FOLLOW ME

"HE SAITH UNTO THEM, BUT WHOM SAY YE THAT I AM?"

Four steps to the throne and the keys of power Christ laid in this lesson:

1. DENY SELF
2. TAKE UP THE CROSS
3. FOLLOW ME
4. CONFESS ME

1. Self-denial is the first step up from selfishness. It is really a step toward the higher interest of self. "Self-denial is self-love living for the future." There are two natures in us, and in self-denial the upper self denies the solicitations of the lower self to go down, and insists on going up instead. 2. But in our climbing out of selfishness, we are not to stop at self-denial. The next step upward in noble character is self-sacrifice. As self-denial brings more joy in the long run than self-indulgence, because we really only deny ourselves what would harm us, so "the ecstasy of sacrifice" is known by the noblest to bring a higher joy than any form of selfishness. We should never call a hardship endure because we must, a "cross." Only a self-sacrifice untariously assumed is worthy of that name. And in voluntary sacrifice of self comes the highest joy known to human nature.

Doctor A. E. Kittredge gives this illustration point: "Here is a young girl, merry, beautiful, rounded by all which can make happy, as the world defines word. Now, place in one scale the joy which is gathered into the rainbow years, and when you estimate its weight, put into other scale the joy of that same girl, now a mother. Her whole being is absorbed in the infant life entrusted to her care. She lives, yet not but that babe lives in and through her. Day by day, night by night she watches over that cherished child. She sacrifices time and strength in all social pleasures—yes, life, if need be—to this one mighty passion, the perfect development of her child to its highest possibilities. Her life grows weary, anxiety and watchfulness steal the bloom of youth from her cheek, the world, it may be, pities her. Well, put this mother's joy on the other scale, with all its burdens and tears and agonizing prayers, which is the heavier? Why, know that the joy of the mother is a depth and fullness which the young girl never dreamed of, not only cause of its unselfishness and grandeur of the life-aim, but because it has been made perfect through suffering. Now, there is a joy dearer, richer than a mother's. It is the joy of the Christian, who has counted all things as loss for the sake of Christ."

When Doctor Mason, one of the missionaries in India, asked his converted boatman whether he was willing to go to the Bghais, a neighboring tribe, to tell them of a Saviour's love, he reminded him that instead of twelve rupees a month, he would receive four rupees. "Can you go to the Bghais for four rupees," asked the missionary. The heathen convert went by himself and thought and prayed, and came back to Dr. Mason. "Well, Chapon, what is your decision?" "My father, I cannot go to the Bghais for four rupees a month; but I can go for Jesus." And for Jesus he went. Think you that in Philippi there were two happier men than Paul and Silas, shouting praises, their feet fast in the stocks and their backs streaming with blood? They were suffering for Jesus and his joy was the result.

3. "Follow me." Here is a creed in three words, the creed with which the apostles began their Christian lives. In this lesson they broadened out into a large creed, including the Divinity of Christ, the Fatherhood of God, inspiration, the church, judgment, the second coming. But for a start one needs only to be willing to follow Christ, to be like him, to be taught of him, whether as God or greatest of men. He who so begins will find through that teaching a Divine Saviour and King.

4. "Confess me." Our love for Christ will die like a smothered plant if it is hidden, for no one can be both a coward and a Christian. Confession at first showing one's colors, like an oath of allegiance at enlistment, and then confession is bearing the colors for conquest, for it is by individual confession of Christ as personal Saviour, even more than by preaching, that the Church has conquered its millions.

By the four steps just named we reach the power of the keys. Here is a bundle of keys; the money-drawer key, suggesting that Christ can give us power to use our property that what we forbid ourselves will be what Christ forbids, and what we permit ourselves will be what Christ permits. A like suggestion comes from the office key, and the trunk key, and the house key. But let us, most of all, remember, that the Cross is the key, the only key, by which we can enter heaven, and that Christ himself, not Peter, is the gate-keeper.

"Is this the way to heaven?" said a street child, who strayed into a mission Sunday School, and saw the class gathered about their teachers in thoughtful study of the Bible. The question was heard by the teachers and sent them to thinking. Are we making this school the way to heaven for our pupils? The pupils themselves heard it, and some of them thought. Are we so using these opportunities of Bible study as to make them the way to heaven for ourselves and our classmates? Only by the cross, only by salvation through Jesus Christ, who died for us, can we enter heaven. "What must I do to be lost?" You need do nothing at all. "What must I do to be saved?" Believe and receive and confess Christ, that all his salvation may be yours.

No other name is given, no other name is known, 'Tis Jesus Christ, the first and last, He saves, and he alone.

[International Sunday School Lesson for April 10, Mark 8: 27-38. Golden Text, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God" Matthew 16: 16.]

Miss Helen Gould at the Bowery Mission

LIKE the sunlight and the genial breath of springtime, Miss Helen Miller Gould, America's uncrowned queen, came very quietly into the Bowery Mission the other night.

It was Mrs. Bird's Thursday evening meeting, however, and the hall was in its usually crowded condition. Many earnest Christian workers were there at their various posts of duty. A telephonic message had been received by Mrs. Bird during the day, to the effect that Miss Gould intended paying us a visit. We had always known how deeply this consecrated lady had sympathized with our work. One of the links that has bound her social work and ours together has been the fact that the Bowery Mission Male Quartette, composed of four of the converts, Mr. V. H. Benke, Mr. L. W. Brown, Mr. J. T. Hunt, and Mr. William H. Smyth, has been called upon so often to assist at the Naval Branch of the Y. M. C. A. in Brooklyn, which has been opened and maintained by Miss Gould's munificence. The quartette, going to and fro, like a little between these two institutions, has grown them very closely together, and we always felt that, sooner or later, Miss Gould would look in upon us and see the place where these four sturdy musical Christians were saved.

It is remarkable how many sailors, and especially boys from the navy, turn in at the regular services of the Mission. It is well known how the "Jackies" adore Miss Gould, so her name is often on our lips, and a profound respect for her is always in our hearts. But no one could ever have dreamed that this great promiscuous crowd of Bowery men, most of them in the grip of direst misfortune, could ever have been aroused to such enthusiasm as it was last Thursday night, at the mere mention of her name.

We used to hear how the soldier boys at the camp at Montauk Point, in 1898, used to sing:

You're the angel of the camp,
Helen Gould!
In the sun-rays, in the damp,
On the weary, weary tramp,
To our darkness you're a lamp,
Helen Gould!

But we were not prepared for the outburst of real, genuine, affectionate applause that came from these homeless men of the Bowery when it was known she was among them.

No announcement having been made of her visit, few of the crowd knew who the sweet-faced lady was who came in so quietly, with Mrs. Russell Sage; and took her place upon the platform by the side of Mrs. Bird.

Very shortly, however, they were told that if they would sing the next hymn heartily it might result in Mrs. Russell Sage being drawn to speak to them, as had happened a few weeks previously, when she visited the Mission. Then it was hinted that the lady sitting with Mrs. Sage might also say a few words. It became necessary at that moment to state who this visitor was, but sooner was the name mentioned than any of the poor fellows, breaking through the usual decorum of our religious meetings, burst into applause. Then, hearing the name of "Helen Gould" started clapping too, until everybody in the hall, on the platform, on the benches, and in the crowd away up on the gallery stairs, began to applaud.

Sure enough they sang "Throw Out the Life Line," in splendid style. Then, at the request of Mrs. Sage, the quartette sang, "Where Is My Wandering Boy Tonight," and, after the opening prayer exercise, both ladies were true to their promise. Mrs. Sage spoke first. Simple, earnest words they were. "The same story," she said, "that I told you before;—Christ loves you, and wants you to come to him." His plea she enforced by relating the fact of the conversion of a poor Scotchwoman who had been taught to offer two prayers, first, "Show me myself," and secondly, "Lord, show me thyself."

Then Miss Gould arose. Again the applause broke out; her lips quivered, and the tears stood in her eyes. It was a beautiful sight. This woman possessing millions, standing so simply with the little Testament in her hand, facing those hundreds of poor homeless men, the great pitying Christ-love beaming in her eyes, and the men so genuinely interested in her, not because she was wealthy, not even because she was so admittedly generous, but because she was good. Mrs. Sage had just a moment ago told Miss Gould that she need not say much of anything, "Just smile on them; that's all they want." And Miss Gould's smile has a wonderful charm; it is one you do not easily forget. But she did say a few words, charming in their simplicity, and, because of the bell-like clearness of her voice, heard in every part of the great hall. "My friends," she began, "I am not a public speaker, and I can only tell you how glad I am to be with you to-night. Perhaps the best thing I can do is to read you two beautiful verses from the Bible." Then she read the glorious sixteenth verse of the third chapter of John, "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." And the thirty-second verse of Matthew 10, "Whosoever therefore shall confess me before men, him will I confess also before my Father which is in heaven." Then, adding the comment that these words were spoken by Christ to those who were sorely tempted and tried, she took her seat.

Miss Gould and Mrs. Sage had not intended to stay long, but when the testimonies began they seemed to become so interested that they could not leave, so they remained to the end. As the wonderful stories came in quick succession for the greater part of an hour, from old men and young men, from bright, clever, educated men, and from those who had not had many advantages, like the old Irish sailor who had been "sailorin' for fifty-four years right square round the world," the interest deepened, and reached its climax when, at the close, many rugged hands were raised for prayer.

A somewhat dramatic incident followed one of the testimonies. Mr. Gustav A. Gayer, a member of the New York City police force, one of President Roosevelt's appointees, is a Bowery Mission convert. In September last, he appeared on our platform and publicly declared himself to be a Christian. In Miss Gould's presence, and it being St. Patrick's Day, Mr. Gayer was very naturally reminded of the dreadful Windsor Hotel fire, five years ago on that same day, and spoke of Miss Gould's hospitality in opening the doors of her mansion, and ministering with her own hands to the injured firemen and policemen. Once again the cheers broke out, and once again the tears came to Miss Gould's eyes.

Immediately upon the benediction being pronounced Miss Gould made many inquiries as to the work of the Mission, asking particularly after Dr. Klopsch and his great CHRISTIAN HERALD charities.

Then, as these Christian gentlemen left the hall, the applause broke out once more, and the poor, forlorn outcasts on the Bowery felt what the boys in the camp had felt five years ago:

In the sun-rays, in the damp,
On the weary, weary tramp,
To our darkness you're a lamp,
Helen Gould!

J. G. H.

The following extract from a letter written by Miss Helen Gould to Mrs. Bird the day after the meeting, will interest our readers:

"I am greatly indebted to you for the invitation you extended to me through Mrs. Sage to visit the service at the Bowery Mission last night. It was an occasion I shall always remember, and I congratulate you on being identified with a work that is carried on for Christ, and in his name. It was a touching sight to see the crowd gathered in the hall, men who had seen the seamy side of life, and who realized their inability to cope alone with the forces against them; for instance, the 'hopeless drunkard,' who asked our prayers. God bless him, and similar men who come to the Mission, as well as those who have not got down so far."

When an expensive and beautiful garment has become soiled and you doubt whether the color will stand washing, don't put it away without trying Ivory Soap. If water will not cause the color to run, Ivory Soap will not. Avoid extremely hot water, hot sun and a too hot iron. Give this suggestion a trial—even experienced housekeepers are surprised.

officers and men. In the new town, all the shops and business buildings were practically demolished, and hardly a residence escaped damage. Every part of the fortified area was so damaged by the Japanese fire that it became unsafe. People were terror-stricken, and many tried to construct rude bomb-proof shelters. One shell fell among a crowd, killing twenty-five. Three clerks in the Port Admiral's office were killed. The highest fort at the harbor entrance was badly damaged, and a tremendous explosion of the powder magazine and arsenal at the Triband shook the town to its foundations. The cruiser Dravica, lying near the Retvizan, was struck by a shell at the waterline and set afire. It was said that eighty persons on board perished. The Retvizan and Cesarevitch were again rendered utterly helpless, and are practically total wrecks, and the Sevastopol was badly damaged. Over 300 persons were killed and many wounded before the enemy withdrew.

Five Japanese warships are said to have suffered serious damage from the guns of the fort. One was hit seven times, and several are now in dock for repairs. That the Japanese suffered considerably is inferred from the number of wounded that have been sent home for hospital treatment. The loss of life is unknown.

Immediately after the bombardment, Admiral Makharoff sank two of the China Railway Company's steamers at the harbor entrance, to reduce the navigable way, and marked the channel by buoys. Next morning five Russian warships left the harbor on a scouting trip, but no Japanese ships were seen. On the following days Admiral Makharoff's squadron made repeated dashes out of the harbor, and these at one time gave rise to the groundless rumor that the ships had gone to join the Vladivostok fleet, Makharoff being determined to risk running the gauntlet of Admiral Togo's ships in the hope of reducing the enemy's power by a bold and fortunate stroke. He has made an urgent demand for a fresh supply of ammunition for the heavy guns of the fortress, much ammunition having been wasted during the earlier bombardments in futile replies to the enemy's fire.

Gen. Stossel has been searching out spies in Port Arthur and the troops have hanged six—four Chinese and two Japanese—who were caught signalling to Togo's ships during the bombardment. From Russian sources, it is stated that Japan has over 2,500 spies at work, and that practically every movement is communicated to the Japanese, frequently in advance.

NOTES OF THE WAR

General Kouropatkin traveled to the seat of war in a heavily-armored train. He was due to arrive at Moukden, March 26.

China has ordered a very large quantity of modern rifles in Germany.

The Russian Vladivostok fleet is at Possiet Bay, to prevent the further landing of Japanese at Gen-san.

The Baltic Russian fleet is preparing to sail for the Far East.

Russia has chartered twenty large transports at Antwerp.

There are now 5,000 Russian troops in Port Arthur and 30,000 in the peninsula.

It is rumored that the Russian destroyer Skori, struck an unplaced mine in Port Arthur harbor, and was destroyed. Out of fifty of a crew, only four were rescued.

There is a report in St. Petersburg that the Czar intends to go to the seat of war.

A Russian Army Corps is now reported to be moving from Vladivostok toward Corea. Strong positions have been occupied in fortified Manchurian towns, where the Japanese advance will be contested at every step.

St. Petersburg hears that the Vladivostok squadron has left that harbor, using dynamite to open a channel through the ice. The situation may be complicated by an attempt of the two Russian fleets to join.

A correspondent at New-Chwang writes: "The Russian flag no longer floats over New-Chwang. From the poles above the public buildings of the town the flag of France flies to-day. The streets are full of rumors hinged upon the coming of the Japanese. There is another story to the effect that five thousand Japanese have landed at Taku Shan, between Dainy and Wiju, and are proceeding toward

New-Chwang. The inhabitants of the town are terror-stricken. This move of the Japanese will enable them to attack New-Chwang simultaneously from the land and the sea."

In Manchuria, the Chinese brigands are again giving the Russians serious trouble. Lately, a Russian outpost near Pan-lachan, some distance north of Port Arthur, was surprised by a troop of mounted brigands, who attacked with great boldness, driving away the guards and capturing two Maxims.

New Seed and Floral Catalogues for the Season of 1904

Storrs & Harrison Co., Painesville, Ohio. Have you seen the New Nephrolepis Pieroni? (The Pieroni Fern) There has not been a plant introduction in years that has seemed to leap into public favor as easily as this plant, illustrated on the cover of The Storrs and Harrison Co. Catalogue. It is not only a decided novelty, but it is, without any exception, one of the grandest, decorative pot plants yet produced. It never grows out of form, and has all the free growing characteristics of the Boston fern. Storrs & Harrison Co., Painesville, Ohio, make a specialty of this beautiful new fern, a facsimile of which, in natural color and size, appears on the cover of their Spring Catalogue 1904.

H. W. Bucklee, Rockford, Ill., have sent out their Seed and Plant Guide, which is rich in beauty, beginning with the front cover, devoted to pansies of the giant variety. Then come carnations, which are gems of beauty, and chrysanthemums, bewildering in their luxuriance, and of enormous size. No less attractive are the vegetables and small fruits. H. W. Bucklee, Rockford, Ill.

Dreer's Garden Book, 1904, is out. Several pages are given of flowers and fruit painted from nature. So lifelike are the representations, one is at a loss to tell which is the most attractive—the fruit and vegetables or the painted flowers. They must be seen to be appreciated. Henry A. Dreer has been growing these seeds and plants for sixty-six years, as the business was established in 1838. Henry A. Dreer, Philadelphia, Pa.

Mills Seed Catalogue comes from Rose Hill, N. Y. Not only are seeds, fruits and vegetables shown in many and beautiful varieties, but fancy poultry breeding and raising is pictured from the incubator to the full-grown kings and queens of the poultry yard. Some of these fowl are almost tropical in plumage, and looking at them one can hardly wonder that so many people get the "hen fever." F. B. Mills, Rose Hill, N. Y.

From Des Moines, Iowa, comes the Thirty-Fourth Annual Catalogue of The Iowa Seed Co. Their 1904 rose collection is exquisite, the Roger Lamberlin, a red rose with leaves edged with white, being especially novel. This firm also advertise a great variety of vegetables, fruits, and lawn supplies. Iowa Seed Co., Des Moines, Iowa.

Green's Nursery Catalogue is at hand. This is an excellent fruit guide. A new fruit is Green's new strawberry with a pineapple flavor. $25 is offered for a name for this new variety of an old table favorite. Many and varied are the other fruits and vegetables for which this nursery is famous. Green's Nursery Co., Rochester, N. Y.

James J. H. Gregory & Son, are out with their forty-fourth catalogue of vegetable and flower seeds. In addition to these they make a specialty of grain and grass seed, timothy red top and clover. Small fruits also receive their attention to a large degree. James J. H. Gregory & Son, Marblehead, Mass.

Conrad & Jones, New Floral Guide for 1904 shows seven new ever-blooming roses, which promise a wealth of beauty all summer and fall. This firm has also introduced a new crimson rambling called the "Philadelphia." This rose is brighter and more intense in color than the old rambler, and does not fade. The colored plate gives a beautiful reproduction of this magnificent rose. Conrad & Jones, Rose Growers, West Grove, Pa.

Catalogues have also been received from Stark Grape Nurseries, Louisiana, Mo.; Flower Seeds, Miss Emma V. White, 818 Nicolett Ave., Minneapolis, Minn. Oliver H. Drew, Hibernia, Dutchess Co., N. Y.; Snow Seeds, Harvey B. Snow, Camden N. Y.; The Galbraith Nurseries, Fairbury, Neb; Jessie B. Prior, seedswoman, Minneapolis, Minn.

Reform in Sacred Song

Views on the Subject of the Universal Hymnal for Piano, Organ and Voice

the Editor:
HAVE read your call for reform in sacred song. This looks like a large undertaking; but when we see in the beginning of this new century changes going to pass which seemed almost impossible, bringing God's people nearer together, we thank God and take courage. The solution of this problem can be easily accomplished provided we surrender all to Christ, which includes love and service to our fellow-men. I am not wedded to a hymn or tune simply because it is old or new. A great many old hymns are dear to me not only for association, but because they embody the true elements of spirituality. The suggestion of a Union Hymnal, containing purely devotional hymns, strikes a responsive chord in my heart, and will no doubt be approved by a large majority of Christian people.

Sometime ago I made a small book of this character for personal use, and having given thoughtful attention to the subject of devotional song, with an experience of many years in the choir and as organist, I desire to give encouragement to the proposition, believing that a plan of this kind would be a means of grace and result in spiritual culture and growth. The explicit command to every Christian is to "Praise God," and plain and simple tunes are best suited to encourage all the congregation to join in the singing. If the people cannot sing according to the rules of music, they can "Make a joyful noise to the Lord of our salvation." The effort should be made and the education will follow. Divergence from the plain path of duty is fraught with danger, and in the realm of modern church music, so called, we have seen results not only undesirable, but sometimes colorable. A large number of hymns and tunes in general use are inspired, and inspiration will continue until our feeble songs are in the one great song of the redeemed in the world above.

I am constrained to believe that part song, harmony, instead of adding to the effectiveness of church service, tends to diminish ritual exercise. Melody is the natural and principal part needed in Sacred Song, or any song, for that matter, to give true expression to the soul, and the simpler the tune and the better the tone, the better.

Richmond, Va. E. A. BARBER.

Dear Editor:—It seems to me rather strange and anomalous that, while some of our leaders in Christian thought and Biblical interpretation are clamoring for modern thought, new thought and criticism, new theology and new methods of preaching and teaching, that we should be leaders of our church music mandating that we throw away our modern hymns and music, and go back one or two hundred years for our hymns and music. Such a demand is certainly founded on a misconception of the situation.

The music of the Christian Church has always corresponded with the preaching of the truth. The preaching and music have always had a great influence on each other, and as the style of preaching has changed, the style of hymns and music has also changed. These are historical facts, which any one can verify for himself. Every age of the Christian Church has produced its own hymns and music. It takes a few of the best of the old, and adds to them many more of their own composition, better adapted to their age. The present generation is a conspicuous example, and, in my opinion, succeeding generations will be increasingly more so. Musical critics! The Christian Church is going forward, not backward, in every thing, even in church music!

If you can persuade the ministers and churches to return to the old style of preaching—sermons one to two hours long and each a body of divinity—then you may succeed in introducing the old hymns and music, not otherwise. The old-time music was excellent and appropriate for that day and generation, only a few of the best have come down to us which we can use to advantage and with profit. The hymns and music of the present day are as good as those of the past as a whole, and much better adapted to the present methods of worship. That there are some modern hymns and music that are not what they ought to be is conceded; these ought to be weeded out. Did ever any old-time music produce such marvelous effects upon men as the hymns "The Glory Song" or "Where is My Wandering Boy To-night"?

A plan like the following may succeed.
1. Ask each congregation, of the churches interested, to select one hundred hymns and tunes which they prefer, and send them to their Presbytery, Association or Conference.
2. Let them select one hundred of the most approved in the number, and forward them to the highest court of their church, who will examine and select one hundred most approved and send to a select committee, who are to prepare the book.
3. Let the committee select two hundred of the most approved, and they might add one hundred of their own selection not found in the list. The book should comprise a judicious selection from old and new. I venture the prophecy that two-thirds of those thus selected will be modern, for the very sufficient reasons that they are selected by moderns, for the use of moderns, and are best adapted to the modern style of worship, and the presentation of the truth as it is in Jesus.

Mary C., Waterbury, Ct. Who built the great wall of China?

It was begun by Tchao-Siang-Wang, Prince of Tsin, and founder of the fourth imperial dynasty of China. The first courses were laid about 211 B.C. Prince Tchao was known as the "Conqueror," from the fact of his having overcome the "fighting kings," a number of feudatories of China, who for more than three centuries had stirred up frequent rebellions.

A. H. S., Nashville, Pa. 1. Why did not Jesus save John the Baptist from being executed by Herod? 2. Was Jesus like John, a total abstainer?

1. As there is no record of his having given reasons, no authoritative answer can be given. It may, however, be suggested that a miracle, such as would have been necessary to save John, was altogether dissimilar from the works Jesus performed when on earth. He avoided the spectacular and ostentatious in these matters. You may ask why God allowed Herod to kill his servant, but we know by sorrowful experience to this day, that his servants still fall victims to human hate and malevolence, as they did in China three years ago, and still more recently when so useful a man as James Chalmers was clubbed to death in New Guinea, and Mr. Labaree, only a few days ago, was killed by brigands in Persia. In the case of John, perhaps God saw that his work as a herald of Christ was done, and possibly that his further preaching might have hindered rather than helped the cause of Christ. You remember that already there was jealousy between the disciples of John and those of Christ. We may be quite sure that Jesus was acting in accord with his Father's will in the matter. 2. The reproach Jesus made (Luke, 7:34) "The Son of Man is come eating and drinking; and ye say, Behold a gluttonous man and a wine-bibber," seems to imply that he was not an abstainer. But the question is still unsettled whether the wine he drank was the fermented stuff now in use. Many learned men, familiar with Oriental customs, insist that it was not.

Mrs. Ella M. Beach, Springfield, Mo., writes: My grandmother, Mrs. Juliette Merchant, is ninety-five years old this month, and reads any ordinary print without glasses. She is not at all feeble for one of her years, but calls on her neighbors, and occasionally attends the ladies' society of the M. E. Church, of which she has been a member for more than fifty years. Most of her early life was spent in New York, but for thirty-five years her home has been at Alma Centre, Wis.

Subscriber, Canon City, Colo. Was David speaking of himself or of Christ when he said (Ps. 69: 20), "Reproach hath broken my heart," etc.?

He was undoubtedly speaking of himself, though as the evangelists show, that and the next verses were applicable to Christ, as prophetic of his experience on the Cross. You will see in verses 22-28, that the spirit David displayed was very different from that of Christ, who prayed, "Father, forgive them; they know not what they do." As with other Old Testament writers, David in this and other passages, unconsciously foreshadowed the sufferings and work of Christ. The apostle intimates (I. Peter 1: 12), that the Old Testament writers were but dimly conscious of the meaning of the revelation they were making.

How I Worked My Way Around the World is indeed a charming book, brimful of interest and instruction for everyone. It shows what can be accomplished when one is determined, and how perseverance overcomes difficulties. Colerain, O. LYDIA S. HEWLEINGS.

Jere T., St. Louis. How old is Corea's civilization and what is its character? Are these people inferior to their neighbors, the Chinese and Japanese?

A well-informed writer and traveler says: "At the time of the Ming dynasty in China, Corea stood on the same height of civilization as China. In many respects, the Coreans were the schoolmasters to the Japanese. In the manufacture of paper, rope and porcelain, in artistic skill with silver, inlaid ironware, graniteware, etc., they were very skilful. The Japanese learned this skill in their marches through Corea. Corea, after her various wars, was cut off entirely from the mainland by the Manchurians, and to this she chiefly owes her present poor condition. Being thus isolated for hundreds of years, she became degraded and her civilization deteriorated. Her kings were weak rulers, and the harem system, the priests and the astrologers built a still higher wall of isolation around them. Work was considered a disgrace. No one of royal blood ever worked or even held a position, and manufacturers and merchants were classed with robbers. Up to the war of 1894, there was not one wagon road in the whole land; cities were united by narrow paths; bridges over rivers were falling to pieces; robber bands were numerous, making business communications almost impossible. Within a decade, however, there has been much improvement." You may judge by these statements how the Coreans compare with their neighbors.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is greatly appreciated for its wonderful and its praiseworthy works of humanity and charity to the whole world. I know of no periodical doing the work of charity on such a wide scope. Selina, Miss. JOHN KENNEDY.

Inquirer, Indiana. Would a device for releasing the natural vapors from medicinal woods, such as pine, eucalyptus, etc., be serviceable in the treatment of tuberculosis by an inhalation process?

We have referred this query to Dr. Samuel G. Tracy, 240 West road street, New York, who replies: "The therapeutic value of pine and eucalyptus have been known for many years, and physicians have used inhalations of the same to relieve irritation in the bronchial tubes for at least twenty-five years. But these vapors do not cure lung tuberculosis. Generally speaking, medicinal preparations are of slight value as inhalants for lung diseases. The lungs were made for inhalation of pure air, which, combined with proper diet (overfeeding rather than underfeeding) and scientific hygiene, make one of the best treatments for early consumption. Inhalations of oxygen and the emanations from radium or thorium are, in my opinion, far more efficient than natural vapors from pine and eucalyptus."

W. A. W., Central City, Ia. I have been wondering for some time whether there is not a more extended way to win souls to Christ, aside from merely preaching in the pulpit. Most churches wait for sinners to come to the church to be saved. There are many who never come, and if they do, it is seldom that any one goes to shake hands with them. Why not appoint a committee to go and visit those that are out of Christ, at their homes, and talk with them? Mr. Moody once said he thought any one could be reached, if approached in the right way.

It is the duty of the church workers to go out into the highways and byways and compel them (that is "persuade" them) to come in. The church or pastor neglecting this duty, is not fulfilling the injunctions of the divine commission.

J. P., Watertown, N. Y. How do you consider the words in the New Testament against the wearing of jewelry should be applied to Christians of to-day? Do you consider it wrong for a Christian to wear jewelry? Is it wrong to accept jewelry as a gift and wear it, and do you consider wedding and engagement rings as out of place?

There is no specific injunction in the case, as far as wedding rings and gifts are concerned, and like many other parts of Scripture, it must be interpreted in the spirit, rather than the letter. One who is bedecked with jewelry is self-stamped as a vain and shallow person. A Christian will not yield to such vanity any more than he or she will go to excess in eating or to extravagance in dress. There can be no valid objection to the wearing of a modest and suitable gift, and certainly we can recognize none to wedding or engagement rings.

V. B., Horton, Kan. Can you tell me where I can get Washington's farewell address?

Any good American history or life of Washington should contain it.

E. H., Westminster, Vt. Why do people bow their heads as if in prayer at communion, after they have taken of the bread and wine? If they pray, what is the substance of their prayer? If the people join in the prayer with the pastor before the bread and wine has been passed, thanking God for his mercies, why do they pray again after they have partaken of the bread and wine?

The bowing of the head is simply an expression of reverence and humility, as in God's presence. Nothing could be farther from the spirit of the occasion than for the communicants to sit upright and stare about them. We consider the attitude of reflection and silent prayer as one that naturally follows after partaking of the elements.

L. K., Beatrice, Neb. Are there more men than women, or more women than men in the United States?

According to the census of 1900, there were 39,059,242 males and 37,244,145 females in the United States.

Miss G. F., New Canaan, Conn. Kindly give the origin of the word, "pin-money."

For a long time after the invention of pins (in the fourteenth century) the maker was allowed to sell them in open shops only on the first two days of January. The English and French court dames and ladies flocked to buy them, having been provided by their husbands with money for the purpose. Hence the phrase "pin-money."

E. F., Foster's Mills, Ga. Do we have any account in the Bible of the angelic singing at the Creation, and where?
Perhaps the passage to which you refer is Job 38: 7. There is nothing else which can be remotely construed as a reference.

Editor. How is coin put into circulation?
Horace White, in Money and Banking, thus explains the process: "The government receives all the gold deposited at the mint by private individuals and converts it into coin or bars free of charge. All silver, nickel or copper coins are made by the government from its own metal, and are sold to the public for gold or its equivalent. The profit which the government makes on such sales is called seigniorage; it is the difference between the cost of the bullion and the price received for the coins." Of the gold sold to the mint, Mr. White writes: "Having bought the bullion, the director of the mint determines what portion shall be coined and what converted into bars. A certain portion is always converted to 'fine bars' for commercial use, and the remainder into mint bars (9-10 fine) suitable for coinage." The coins are paid out to bullion depositors and go at once into circulation.

P. R., Boulder, Colo. Did not the men who undertook to revise the Bible come under the condemnation of Rev. 22: 19, which warns people against adding to or taking away parts of the Word of God?

No, the Revision was quite in accord with the spirit of that warning. It sought to make the Bible a more exact and faithful rendering into English of the book as it was originally written. We cannot afford to have any ambiguity in a book so important as the Bible; was therefore a good service that the Revisers performed in going carefully over our version, and correcting mistakes in translation which had been made by the earlier scholars. Ancient manuscripts had been found also, since the earlier translation had been made, which shed valuable light on certain passages. The Revised Version, therefore, is a better Bible than the old.

J. K., Burt, Iowa. What is the meaning of Higher Criticism?

The ordinary criticism concerned itself with the translation, meaning and application of the passages of the Bible; the criticism to which the term "higher" is applied is above those details. It is occupied with date and authorship of the various books and with an analysis of them in an attempt to ascertain whether they were written by one man or several, and whether they had been edited by other scholars of a later date.

V. S. Mendon, Okla. What kind of a body did Christ have between the resurrection and the ascension? I heard a minister say recently it was a spiritual body, I thought it was the same body he had always had.

We infer from the Gospel narratives that it was the same body, but that it had undergone changes during the time it had been in the epulchre. The fact that the sepulchre had been found empty seems conclusive on the point. You cannot imagine the body having been removed. Then, too, the Lord showed Thomas the wounds of the nails and the spear, which identified him. That it was not wholly a spiritual appearance was proved by the Lord himself, who, when he saw that his disciples were disposed to regard him as a spirit, took pains to convince them (Luke 24:37-43) by assuring them that a spirit did not have flesh and bones as he had, and he gave them further proof by eating with them. Nevertheless, his entering a room when the doors were shut, and his appearing at places distant from one another at brief intervals, indicated that the body had been spiritualized in being raised from the dead.

D. E. T., Sharon, No. Dak. It sometimes happens, in isolated localities, that the church is the only place available for public gatherings, and concerts, readings, lectures, etc., are given there. Inquirer, Rahway, N. J. Yes, Mr. Elmer E. Hubbard's orphanage work in Cardenas, Cuba, is making excellent progress. He writes that it is receiving generous local support, the Cardenas City treasury paying it $100 monthly, and prominent citizens pledging another $100. He needs a trained American helper.

E. S. W., Houston, Tex. A borrower who becomes a party to a proceeding against his creditor on the ground of usury, may have good legal and moral grounds for his action. There are plenty of money-lending sharks who deserve to be prosecuted. If, however, the debtor merely seeks, under shelter of the statute against usury, to avoid paying his honest debt, he is quite as deserving of blame as the other. Of course, there can be no morality in such a proceeding.

PUZZLE NO. 1

AN officer, detailed to watch a port where foreign men-of-war were anchored, found one day in the water a book in a strange language. His curiosity was excited, he made diligent inquiry, and finally learned that the book was the New Testament. Securing a copy in a language he could understand, he and three companions undertook a diligent study of the book. One of them, who had learned to read English, made frequently a two days' journey to another city to consult a recently arrived missionary about the most difficult passages, and returned with the information. In this manner a Bible class was carried on for three years. Then the officer himself visited the missionary to learn more about Christianity, and after a few days of instruction was baptized.

In what harbor was the New Testament found? Name the officer and the missionary

A College Girl's Happy Thought

SO much attention is constantly given in these days to what is familiarly called the servant problem, that it is rather interesting to find it treated from a new point of view, by an enterprising and intelligent young woman, who determined to take a hand in it herself. Miss Lillian Pettengill, a graduate of Mount Holyoke College, and a girl still in her twenties, resolved that she would emulate the example set by Prof. Wycoff, and Miss Marie Van Vorst and others, and see for herself what were the especial difficulties and disadvantages of domestic service. Miss Pettengill happened to be living in Philadelphia; naturally she took that conservative city as her field of effort. Dropping her own personality, and assuming the Christian name of "Eliza," with another surname, she started out to grope among the foundations of society in the ordinary middle-class American home. She begins the interesting preface of her book Toilers of the Home, by saying: "I am a servant girl, and I work in the kitchen of strange women for my daily bread."

"I was not born to the life, like Topsy, nor did I slide into it along the line of least resistance, as into an inheritance from my forbears. Quite the contrary. Why am I, then, as I am? Because I have observed, heard, read and believed that the respectable American girls who work will cheerfully starve and suffocate in a mill, factory or big department store, or live almost any other kind of life, rather than grow healthy, fat and opulent in domestic service; and this, when the housekeepers do all but stand on the street corners as they pass, beseeching them to come in and help. How can my countrywomen, with their own living to make, be so blind to the butter side of their bread? This is what I propose to find out."

Miss Pettengill did find out for herself, taking the initiative, by applying at an intelligence office, with the plea, "I want a place to do housework." She easily succeeded in finding a situation in a family of the happy-go-lucky variety, a go-as-you-please style as to their housekeeping, who honestly did their best to give their maid as easy a time as was practicable in their domestic economy, and who, having few superfluous refinements themselves, would have been surprised to know how often they shocked the fastidious taste of their new incumbent. They were plain people living in a plain way. Nevertheless, the maid, in this home, found herself obliged to work on an average of fifteen hours a day, was lodged in an uncomfortable room, with an uncomfortable bed and scanty toilet conveniences, while her food, though sufficient, was never very satisfactory. The everlasting round of sweeping, scrubbing, cooking and dish-washing, tired the novice at first almost to the point of despair. Help was given with the washing but the ironing was a terrible task. After four weeks spent in this situation, the amateur worker determined that she had had enough of experience here. Her next position was with a family of two, in which the wife was so eccentric and nervous that she was practically insane. Miss Pettengill filled out her round of four weeks here and then left, taking another place with three charming, spinster sisters, whose housekeeping was very nearly ideal.

This episode was so pleasant that had she been a professional, she would probably have desired nothing better than to remain with the considerate sisters. Her next place was with a mistress so hard and disagreeable, so exacting and selfish, that one wonders that any maid ever remained a week under the roof of so tyrannical a mistress.

Finally our brave young woman accepted service in a family of seven in a suburb. Here there was an establishment, consisting of cook, chambermaid, laundress, coachman, beside herself as waitress, with the usual conditions in such a home. The conclusion which this courageous young woman has reached is that American girls will never as a body enter domestic service, unless it can revert to the usage of a simpler day or become more of a recognized business. At present the stigma is in some ways intolerable. No matter how cultivated, versatile or refined a servant may be, she occupies a very low round on the ladder, and between her and her employer socially a great gulf exists. The work in most families, while it may not be hard, is never-ending and still-beginning. The maid has little time to herself and little freedom to go about as other working women do. The novice, as a rule, is paid quite as fairly and as generously as the expert. Any woman with the merest scrap of reference or none at all, who wishes to take a place, can find one. Miss Pettengill evidently thinks that the problem will never be solved until we return to simpler conditions, and until, as in olden times in this country, housekeepers regard their employees as friends. She also deems it very desirable that as a rule there should be a definite ending to the day, and that the women who toil in the household should, if possible, have their own homes somewhere outside of their employer's house, coming to their work in the morning and going home at night.

The book is a useful and interesting contribution to a large subject and is well worth reading, though it simply flashes the light of a farthing candle upon a great darkness. M. E. S.

Escaped from Cannibals

NEW GUINEA is a country with great natural wealth, and whether the people who wish to take advantage of it go among cannibal savages or civilized Christians, depends on themselves. The Rev. W. R. Mounsey recently described the work done by himself and his colleagues of the British New Guinea Mission on the north coast. This part of the world was, twelve years ago, inhabited by a race of dangerous cannibals. Stirring times were the lot of the first missionaries who went out, and often the bishop, or one of his assistant clergy, landing on a lonely part of the beach, were immediately surrounded by hundreds of chocolate-colored savages, whose bared teeth gleamed no less ominously than the huge spears which they carried.

On one occasion, the bishop of New Guinea had his whaleboat wrecked on the coast, and lost everything. He and another clergymen laid their wet clothes on the beach to dry in the sun. Presently they saw a crowd of savages watching them, and fearing mischief, they dressed and walked boldly towards the crowd, which slowly dispersed. It was afterwards learned that the boat had been watched and a great feast planned, in which the Bishop and clergymen were to be eaten. Cannibalism is now practically extinct, although several natives practice it in secret. Infanticide, and in a measure polygamy, too, are disappearing through the influence of the mission, which has also done much to pacify the rival tribes and to induce them to work willingly and lead cleanly lives. A fever hospital, which was established for the benefit of traders, is in danger of being closed for lack of funds.

A Letter All Women Should Read

"My Bissell sweeper is one of the treasures of my home. Two years ago I was an invalid, making sweeping and dusting duties to be dreaded. Reading about the Bissell Sweeper, I concluded to buy one, and feel it my duty to tell you how greatly pleased I am with it. I can do my sweeping now in much less time, and without fatigue, and don't have to use the dust pan or duster. The sweeper gives a gratifying freshness to my carpets, and with no dust settling back upon draperies or curtains, or carrying disease to the household. I look upon the Bissell Sweeper as a priceless invention. I would not be without one for four times the price."

We have received thousands of letters of the tenor from users of our sweepers throughout the world. Remember the name Bissell marks the genuine.

The CURSE of the CONGO

FROM the great rubber-producing forests of the Congo comes a tale, which for heartless brutality and unspeakable atrocities, could not well be surpassed, even by the most lurid imagination.

The Congo Free State, the vast African territory, was originally explored by Henry M. Stanley, and later exploited by the Belgians, and created by treaty of Berlin a free and independent State, with Leopold II., King of the Belgians, as its ruler. For several years stories of the dreadful way in which the poor savages have been treated have been going the rounds of the papers, but not very much attention has been given the subject, for Africa is a good many miles away, and the sufferers were only Congo "niggers."

The dissolute old man who is called King of the Belgians, and who is always more interested in finding some new avenue for debauchery than in the welfare of any of his subjects, cannot be supposed to care how many poor black men women and children are beaten, mutilated, or murdered in cold blood.

Leopold is not only sovereign of the region, but also the largest stockholder in the companies engaged in the collecting and exporting crude rubber, obtained from trees in the great Congo forests.

The Congo Free State now covers 802,000 square miles, mostly jungle. Not long ago the population numbered from 14,000,000 to 15,000,000 blacks, uncivilized or only partly civilized. There were but 2,000 whites, of whom 70 per cent. were government officials.

For some time the black population has been steadily decreasing, this being the result of horrible cruelties and incredible tyranny practiced upon them by the whites in the region.

The government officials and the holders of its rubber concessions, instead of civilizing the natives and developing the country, have enslaved the one, and were milking the other without any regard to the future, but with a sole eye to big profits. A year ago a book showing up the dreadful state of affairs, was published by two Englishmen; it told of outrages, murders, and slave raidings by the white officers of the Congo State and their native soldiers.

Coming as the book did after many similar stories by other persons, it aroused England, and the Government set about finding out things. At first the Congo Free State denied the charges, and then argued that forced labor was necessary and good for the natives, because they couldn't pay taxes any other way, and then England was accused of wanting to get the country herself. Now a book has been issued containing an official report by the British Consul at the Congo capital. This man made a journey through the Congo territory, and he bears out all these statements of cruelties and misrule, and supplies still further details of the reign of murder and tyranny now existing in this part of Africa. Native testimony in one part of territory was confirmed in other parts, thousands of miles distant.

The Congo region is being rapidly depopulated; the natives must supply rubber or be whipped at the stake or imprisoned; when they refuse to work or try to run away, they are shot and their bodies are mutilated. The only laws in practical effect in the outlying regions are dictated by the whims and greed of the white man and his native soldiery. The Congo soldiers are blacks, with Belgian officers; when asked by Mr. Casement, the author of the book, why they should help the whites to rob and murder their own race, they replied, "It is better to be with the hunter than with the hunted."

Expeditions are sent into the native villages, unable or unwilling to furnish the supplies of rubber demanded by the Government officers, and when these black soldiers get back from these raids they must account for every cartridge with which they were supplied upon the start. A life must have been the forfeit of every cartridge not brought back, and to prove that they have fulfilled orders, they have to take back a human hand.

Sometimes when shooting had been bad, they got the hands by maiming living prisoners and turning them loose. No bullets were wasted on children, the soldiers killed them with the butts of their guns.

When the men do not work fast enough, and do not bring rubber in sufficient quantities, their wives are seized and kept as prisoners. Mr. Casement says at one point he unexpectedly came upon an open shed, where two sentries of the rubber company were guarding fifteen native women, five of whom had infants at their breasts and three more were about to become mothers.

"Why don't you catch the men and not the women?" was asked.

"O, don't you see," replied the sentry, "if I caught and kept the men who would work the rubber? But if I catch the wives, the husbands are anxious to have them home again, and so the rubber is brought in quickly and quite up to the mark."

When night came these women were tied together, either neck to neck or ankle to ankle, and in this condition they try to huddle around a little fire.

All the natives working in the cutting and drying sheds are prisoners, watched by armed guards. A most miserable equivalent is given these poor, helpless blacks for their labor. It is in the form of strings of beads, wooden-handled knives, and sometimes a little salt. A large basket of rubber was brought in by a man who received a knife worth about five cents. It was explained to the Consul that the impositions of rubber getting laid upon the natives were really regulated by law, and were calculated on the scale of public labor required of them in lieu of taxes. Mr. Casement asked how that could be, seeing that the proceeds went to the commercial companies and not to the State. A rubber concession not only implies a certain area of land, but the people on the land.

The supply of rubber is rapidly decreasing in the country as the trees are tapped, and in some places the men have to go two days' journey into the forests after their precious burdens; but no matter what the conditions a man must bring in a certain quantity of rubber, the alternative being the jail, or flogging, or both.

There are now desolate wastes where, only a few years ago, stood prosperous native villages.

One day a party found themselves traveling along track through the forest which at only a recent date had been opened up by a large number of natives. On being asked what the road was, a native replied, "It is a road along which we used to carry rubber to the white men."

"But why used to?"

"Oh, all the people have either run away or have been killed or have died of starvation, and so there is no one to get rubber any longer."

Similar testimony was given by the Rev. William Morrison, a Presbyterian Missionary, who was returning home to America. He said that the people had fled to escape the tyranny of the white man, and now that this awful state of things has become known, the question arises, how shall the abuses be stopped?

Whether they shall cease now is the question laid before Europe by the British Government with the publication of these official papers. The last communication of the series is a memorandum addressed by the Marquis of Lansdowne, the British Foreign Minister, to the British representatives at Paris, Berlin, St. Petersburg, Rome, Madrid, Brussels, The Hague, Copenhagen, Stockholm and Lisbon. It requests that Mr. Casement's consular report be laid before the Governments to which they are accredited, with an inquiry as to when an answer may be expected to the British note of last August.

That is, Great Britain asks the Powers which created the Congo Free State, and still maintain it, whether these things shall cease or continue.

An Eye-Witness Describes the Great Sea Fight in Chemulpho

LETTERS have been received by the Methodist Missionary Society in New York from Bishop David H. Moore, who left Shanghai for Chemulpho, Corea, several days before the great naval battle, of which the writer was an eye-witness later. The first letter, dated February 13, is in part as follows:

"I reached here last Monday morning in the Sungari, a Russian ship, which, with two Russian cruisers, was destroyed the next night.
Doubtless you have heard of the naval engagement off this harbor, the opening of the long-expected war between Japan and Russia.
With brothers Cable and Critchett, Methodist missionaries, and Gen. Allen, of the Philippines, I witnessed it. We were not 800 yards from the Koreitz when she was blown up. The Japanese have pushed their ships, and as the result of the first week have sunk, captured or disabled thirteen Russian vessels, including three battleships. Japanese soldiers are being landed in large numbers and on Monday will march northward.

"Japan has virtually established a protectorate over Corea, sending out the Russian Minister and staff and putting all Russians under guard. The Korean Emperor is cowering in his palace, promising to be good and to look only to Japan for protection. His soldiers guard the palace and police the city as usual, but there are two Japanese soldiers to one Korean soldier in Seoul. The people are afraid of the Russians; not nearly so much so, if at all, of the Japanese. The Japanese are ready for every phase of the struggle. Men, supplies, everything, everywhere. Minister Allen is looking carefully after all the missionaries.
They have large supplies laid in and will stick.
Our annual meeting, which I postponed to this week, was small. I made the best disposition possible of the all too scant force, and leave them, in these rude alarms of war, in the care of our loving Lord."

The other letter, dated Feb. 15, reads:

"The Japanese are landing troops and supplies constantly and their navy is eating up the Russians. This cannot go on forever.
The other side will have its inning, but I think the Japanese will win out. Operations on land will not be different. The Japanese land forces are ideal. They have everything, including a splendid Red Cross organization.
In case the Russians throw over a column into Corea, the bloody field of Pyeng Yang is not unlikely to be once more the scene of carnage.
It is too fearfully cold to move our women and children now overland—the river to the coast at Chinampo being frozen solid. We dare not leave our property. So, if the Russians move that way, the missionaries in Seoul and Chemulpho will go northward and will bring the women and children down, leaving the Pyeng Yang men to guard the property.

"I do not relish the idea of leaving the field when this war is on. I have told the mission and Minister Allen that if I can be of service in protecting our property and workers I will stay, and if I am cabled to by the authorities of the church in the United States to stay until my successor arrives I will cheerfully do so, and let the General Conference go. This will not prevent my holding the Japan conferences, from which I would return here. As an old soldier I do not like to travel away from the sound of guns, when our missionaries are exposed. There are many reasons why I should like to be at General Conference, but these are not to be considered for a moment if it is deemed best that I should stay.
Mrs. Moore is in Shanghai."

The Martyred Missionary

LATER details, received from Persia, indicate that the missionary whose death was reported on our editorial page last week, was the Rev. Benjamin W. Labaree, the son and colleague in mission work of Dr. Benjamin Labaree, the veteran author and translator, who has given more than forty years to the propagation of the Gospel in Persia. A cablegram received by the Rev. Robert
M. Labaree, of Doylestown, Pa., another son of Dr. Labaree, states that his brother was returning from Khoi, with a servant,
when he was attacked. The servant was shot on the spot, and Mr. Labaree was carried off to the hills, where he was stabbed to death.
The motive for the crime, the cable message adds, is obscure. Whether it was the work of brigands or of fanatics remains to be discovered. The Government is said to be active, and public sympathy intense.

THE LATE REV. B. W.
LABAREE

The loss of so earnest and devoted a missionary will be severely felt by the Presbyterian Board, and will be a heavy blow to his venerable father and the missionaries on the field. Mr. Labaree was a native of Persia, having been born at Urumiah on June 5, 1865, in the early years of his eminent father's service in that land. He was brought to America for his education, studying at Marietta College, Ohio, and at Hartford Theological Seminary. In 1893 he received his appointment as missionary to Persia and sailed for his field of labor in September of that year. Dr. F. G. Cowan, who was one of his associates, is now in New York, and bears testimony to the devotion and ability with which he labored during the ten years of his service and the promise he gave of still more valuable work in the future. He leaves a widow and two children to mourn his death. Mrs. Labaree herself belongs to a missionary family. She is the daughter of Dr. H. A.
Schauffer, now of Cleveland, O., whose work as a missionary of the American Board in Turkey is well known. She was born in Constantinople during her father's term of service, and has proved an ideal missionary's wife. The sympathy of God's people in all lands will go out to her in the bereavement which has fallen upon her.

"The Dewey of Japan"

Vice-Admiral Togo, the "fighting" Admiral of the Japanese fleet, was trained in Great Britain. When on board the British training ship Worcester, he was "reported" to be of excellent conduct, and of very good ability.
During the Chino-Japanese War he commanded the cruiser Naniwa, which sank the troopship Kowshing, a steamship belonging to the Indo-China Navigation Company, which was carrying Chinese troops. A curious fact in connection with this event was that the Kowshing was commanded by Captain Galsworthy, who also received his training on board the Worcester some six years after Admiral Togo had left. Captain Galsworthy, when the Kowshing sunk, would have been drowned had it not been that Admiral Togo sent a boat to rescue him. Admiral Togo, who is a Satsuma Samurai, a true-blooded Japanese, is regarded by his countrymen as the man of the hour, and perfect confidence is placed in his courage and resourcefulness.

Destroyers in Battle

During the recent fight between the torpedo fleets off Port Arthur, an exciting personal encounter occurred between a Japanese sailor and the captain of the Russian destroyer Steregoutchi. When the Japanese destroyer closed with the Russian vessel, a Japanese sailor sprang aboard and met the Russian commander emerging from his cabin. They sprang at each other, and the sailor brought his cutlass down upon the head of the Russian, felling him. He endeavored to rise, but the sailor kicked him overboard and he was drowned. The Steregoutchi and another Russian destroyer were surrounded by four Japanese destroyers, which kept up a continuous fire upon them. The Russians fought with the utmost bravery. Their captains tried to make a running fight, break through the Japanese cordon and reach the harbor. One of them succeeded, but the Steregoutchi became hopelessly damaged and at the mercy of the Japanese. Over twenty were killed on the bridge.

LIVING PICTURES

By Margaret Bottome

AM sorry for those who were not at the opening of the Wesley Hall Mission, in New York, on the night of March 12. We visit galleries to see famous painted pictures, and we do not see what the "living pictures" men were that night.

On the platform sat the venerable Bishop Andrews of the M. E. Church, of the new Mission is a Methodist Mission, rightly named for the founder of Methodism. The Secretary of the Church Extension Society led the meeting for the first half hour before passing it over to S. H. Hadley, the Superintendent of the new Mission.

He was especially delighted when Dr. North introduced Dr. Klopsch. If it can be said to any one man "I was hungry and you fed me," it will be said to that man. None of us who heard him will ever forget the farmer he told us of, whose farm produced so little he had thought he would give up farming. It was well for him he did not sell out, for he owned a farm with a gold mine on it. Shall we ever forget the truth that came home to us that we were trying to get along half the time discouraged, when we really are owners of gold mines—"heirs of God."

What a picture to look at were the men on that platform!—men representing a class. "For this cause they are in the world as their Master was before them."

Mr. Hadley was as natural and unostentatious as ever. He said none but he knew by he had prayed for that Hall. He told his experience and he sang "It's the old-time religion; it was good enough for father and it's good enough for me." Any a mother heard the song, unseen by us as she looked at her lost boy now rescued through "the old-time religion." Of course, Mr. Hadley led the army of redeemed drunkards who were there, ready to testify to the grace that had saved them. They took the witness-stand and told the story of the Mighty Christ who had taken them, when homeless, friendless, in rags and filth, and made them what we could see they now were.

Though I had known something of the Mission work, I had never realized its character as I did that night, when the man who spoke made it perfectly clear to us that the Rescue Mission is the only place where a drunkard is sure of a welcome—where he can go without a cent of money. One man told of his going to the Water Street Mission. He had been determined to go, to make one effort to save himself, and he had borrowed fifteen cents to get there. When the fifteen cents were given him, the temptation was too great; he spent it in drink. Then, without a cent, and almost without clothes (for he had pawned everything) he entered the Mission, and told his whole story to the Superintendent. Mr. Hadley took $4.50 of his pocket and said, "Go, buy some clothes."

He almost held my breath, fearing the man was going to say, "And I went and drank it," but he did not. In that moment I saw the truth of what George Eliot said, "They that trust us educate us." To look at Mr. Hadley and that man at that moment was worth more than the price of admission to any picture gallery.

I tried to open some drawers of my writing desk lately and found it impossible. I stepped into the next room and asked a workman. "Would it be too much to ask you to help me for a moment?" "I cannot open a drawer." He took up his tools and came in, and in a few moments the drawer was opened and working smoothly. As I thanked him, he remarked quietly: "All that was necessary was tools."

People are tools. Some are sharp; some are dull. What is needed to-day is what the writer calls the "I can and I will" sort of people. I read only a short time ago that there are places ready for such people. The writer said that the supply does not equal the demand. "Pluck up courage, ye unfortunate ones," he added, "ye tubbers, ye 'I can't' people. Begin the fight by abolishing fears, then start to climb the ladder, shouting, 'I can and I will' with all your might, drowning out the sound of the 'buts,' 'ifs,' 'supposings,' 'you can'ts' and 'aren't you afraid's' of your wet-blanket friends at the foot of the ladder. Do not bother about the upper rounds of the ladder, you will reach them in time; but give your whole attention to the round just ahead of you, and when you have gained a firm foothold on that, then look at the next one. One round at a time. Give your entire attention to each step. Climb with desire, confidence."

Grumblers do not enter the promised land. Grumbling is weakness—bad tools to do life's work with—we need people full of faith, full of hope, full of love. These are splendid tools.

Not long ago a friend startled me by saying suddenly with such intensity—"Thank you! thank you! you have given me courage!" Oh, how glad I was. I suppose I must have been using the tools I am so fond of, and suddenly the drawer, so to speak, opened. What splendid opportunities came to us of helping crippled souls to emancipation, if we only had eyes to see. I shall not forget a young girl to whom I said, when she left me, "I am sorry I could not help you," she wanted a situation. She looked at me and said, "You have helped me. You have given me courage."

I was once in a meeting where my attention was taken up with a rare face—a face that told as plainly as words could utter, that she had known sorrow, and it had been sanctified to her. There was a refinement in that face that was of the spirit. I hardly heard what was going on, I was taken up with the face of the woman. She did not speak, though I hoped she would. When the meeting was over, I went up to her and said, "I cannot tell you how much I have enjoyed your testimony." She said, "I did not speak." "No," I answered, "but I looked at you."

How many may be helped by looking at us.

Thus many may be helped by looking at us. The suffering that comes from not being able to see faces, that unlock all the things that are in you; no one knows better than I the hunger that comes from the loss of a face and the longing to see it again. But we shall see; we shall again touch the vanished hand; and in the meantime, during the "little while," can we not become more like them? Cannot we have what they had?

O, for the power to unlock human hearts that cannot unlock themselves! I wonder if we earnestly covet the best gifts. Surely this is one of them. To be such a tool in the Master's hand that in using us He can unlock many who, for some cause or other, are now closed to all love and sympathy and courage and hope.

A Seedless Apple.

John Spencer, an old Colorado fruit grower, after experimenting for seven years, has produced a seedless apple. The inside of the fruit is solid, while the general formation is very much like a navel orange, even to the depression in the navel end. The tree which bears the seedless apple is most unusual in that it does not blossom. Mr. Spencer says that he will keep the secret of his budding and grafting. He is confident that he will be able to produce seedless apples of every variety. Soon after the seedless orange was obtained he began experimenting with apples.

Two years on ESKAY'S FOOD

A LETTER from the father of this rosy, smiling girl says:—"Our little girl, Dorothy, when fourteen months old was so alarmingly ill that the physician gave us little hope of recovery. Her stomach refused to retain various foods which we tried until we fortunately procured ESKAY'S, which she took to at once with evident relish. Her condition improved at once and in a few days she was out of danger. She continued with the food for two years, constantly growing in strength and health. The physician agrees that ESKAY'S SAVED HER LIFE."

All Eskay Babies Are Alike:— STRONG, WELL-FORMED, HEALTHY and HAPPY

We show herewith two additional ESKAY FOOD BABIES who prove this statement.

Every mother should have our book "How to Care for the Baby." Sent free with samples of ESKAY'S FOOD.

WHAT WILL YOU GIVE TO BE WELL?

—perfectly, completely well, with that glad, joyous freedom and happiness in life and sweet personal loveliness which health and a well developed, graceful body alone can give?

WILL YOU GIVE FIFTEEN MINUTES A DAY? If you will, you can be free—you can be graceful—you can be lovable and wholesome; you can have bounding, buoyant, vibrant health which will make the world look sweeter to you and you will look sweeter to the world.

There is nothing in girlhood or womanhood so lovely as a healthy, vigorous, well-kept body, sound and sweet and wholesome, full of life and strength and fire. There is nothing which gives a woman such power to win love and to wield influence.

YOU CAN BE WELL WITHOUT DRUGS

YOU CAN MAKE YOURSELF

- A BETTER WIFE
- A RESTED MOTHER
- A SWEETER SWEET-HEART
- A MORE CHEERFUL, MORE WHOLESOME COMPANION
- A TRUE, WELL-BALANCED WOMAN

A CORSET IS NOT NEEDED FOR A GOOD FIGURE

It is two years this month since I began to teach women the principles of perfect health through mail instructions and my success has been marvelous. I cannot tell you how happy it makes me to realize that I have relieved over 7,000 women of all sorts of physical ailments by simply strengthening the vital organs, the nerves, the heart and the lungs. I simply teach them the laws of nature. Their brains are clear, their cheeks are rosy, their steps are buoyant; they learn how to breathe and they express that buoyancy and vivacity of life which is the crown of American womanhood. Surely what I have done for others I can do for you. My work cultivates that distinguished carriage and bearing which bespeak culture and refinement.

True attractiveness is in perfect health, grace of movement, free and wholesome thoughts. These are your birthright and may be retained by simply putting yourself in harmony with Nature. The following are extracts from three of my pupils' letters on my desk as I write: "I have grown from a nervous wreck into a state of good, quiet nerves."

"I have never felt so perfectly well. Just think, you have relieved me of indigestion and constipation which have bothered me for years and years. Since you have relieved me of these troubles, I have gained thirty pounds in weight and have lost the throat trouble which refused to move with medicine."

"I will strengthen the stomach and nerves so that your food will nourish you; strengthen the liver, kidneys and intestines so that the impurities are thrown off from the system. Stimulate a sluggish circulation and send the blood bounding through your veins so that the rheumatic twinges will disappear and you will feel warm and comfortable; strengthen a weak heart or lungs; relieve you of lame backs and headaches. I can do more for you than medicine can do. I can give you a Clear Brain, a Quick Perception and a New Lease of Life by simply strengthening the vital organs."

I can take but a limited number of pupils, because I give each pupil my personal attention. I do not work with a woman unless I am sure I can help her. I know I can Reduce Prominent Abdomens and Hips, build up thin necks and chests, and bring any woman to roundness and symmetry. I have done all of these hundreds and hundreds of times. It is no longer an experiment with me.

Write to me, telling me your particular difficulties, and I will send you letters from my pupils and give you the names of women who have been relieved of above difficulties. I will tell you just what I feel I can do for you, and I will send you an instructive leaflet on how to stand correctly. Every woman should know this if she would be perfectly well. I charge you nothing for this leaflet and nothing for my information in regard to your case. Do not hesitate, write at once.

THE STRANGE STORY OF KO*

IT was night in the city of Ping-yang, dark and forbidding. A few straggling lights were seen passing here and there through the narrow streets. There were long weird calls heard from the Yamen, repeated at intervals, and drums rattling in prayer to the devils down on the river. Somebody was dead over the way, and there was desperate weeping, "I-go! I-go!" Drinking dens everywhere made night hideous. In a hut, that squatted low by the gate of the city, sat a heavy-faced Korean, holding fast a woman's hand.

"You swore you'd live with me always," was what he said.

Her answer came cool and steady: "You make the money and I'll live with you, not otherwise."

"But," said he, "we are man and wife and child, and I must keep you, else we die together."

"Die, do we? Not if I know it," and she wrenched her hand from him and pushed him violently away. "I'm not here to die with you, but to live."

Ko shot out of the door as if for his life, and fled to pray to the dragon on the hill; then he came back to an inn near by, drank himself drunk, and, for the moment, slept away his sorrows.

For five months she saw him not, and the wee dot of a baby, with its black eyes and Mongol soul, lived unconscious of the one who claimed it. At last, unwashed and bedraggled, through the East Gate of the city, came staggering the man Ko, sans "cash." His home, as he expected, was occupied by another. A desperate case his, ordinary ways and means were out of the question. He loved his wife and child, of course, but she had drifted away from him on the wing of some malignant spirit, and none but the gods could bring her back.

"Oh," says she, "you are here?"

"But not to stay," said Ko; "merely to speak my word and depart."

She looked with surprise at this, for she had thought him greatly in love with her, and a willingness of any kind on his part to leave was startling.

Said he, "The gods have spoken to me. I have a plan that will make us happy by and by, but cannot tell it now." He drew from his pocket a paper tablet marked, "Ten-years-and-we-shall-know," tore it in two, gave half of it to the woman, and said "Keep it safe till I return." In the manner of the Orient they wept together and parted.

All the devils were in league. Here was the wife he wanted, and the child, but lost to him. He would overcome, yes, in spite of fiends. He dreamed of money, saw strings of cash floating in his visions, though in actual life he was a gambler, a drunkard, a thief, who found scores of companions, ready made to do him service. Said he, "As long as this wretched mouth of mine is in working order, with eyes and ears to help, I can do nothing; once rid myself of mouth and I'm all right; gag it, put a stopper in it, and I can see my way clear, but how? Refuse to speak? They'd stone me out of town. The spirits must settle this matter too."

Back of the city suburb, where he now lived, there was a famous shrine, under the hill, noted for its mysterious power. Any one who prayed earnestly to it got what he wanted; and any one who took liberties, was dealt with after the manner of the immortal gods. On the first day of the moon and the fifteenth day, the people of the town brought food and money and paper, and spread it out on the ground before the spirit and said, "O spirit! here is this offering, take it, eat it, inhale it, do what you like with it, only be good, and give us money, and rice, and sons, and good grave sites, and long life, and nothing to do, amen!"

Ko made inquiry of the village folk. "How about the god up on the hill there, is he any good?"

"Good? Well I should say, get what you want if you go at it right, or you'll get the day of judgment if you try any non-sense."

*From The Vanguard, a tale of Corea, by James S. Gale. Pages, 320; price, $1.50. Fleming H. Revell Co., New York, publishers.

So Ko took a jug of whiskey and a censer, and went up to pray.

A few days later, when a crowd gathered in the inn, said he, "I prayed to that 'business' up on the hill, five days ago now, and no sign of an answer. Call it good, do you? Good for nothing I should say. I have a mind to take a bamboo and smash the thing to pieces."

The listeners gave a start. "You evidently want to die an awful death," said they. "Blasphemy!" shouted others, stopped their ears and ran.

Ko thundered out into the street, tore his hair, danced like a fury, swore awful oaths against the spirit and the shrine, ran amuck up the hill and with a rock, hurled straight at it, bang! "To perdition!" shouted he. "You and other demons like you." But scarcely had the words passed his lips, when he fell, bowled over, as if struck by lightning. The town folk came slowly and cautiously out to see what was left of him, and found blood around his mouth. "Ah, ha!" said they, "the spirit! the spirit!" He was carried home and laid in a corner, and so passed the night.

Next day he arose, but there were no words in his mouth, no answer to questions; those who whispered to him left without response. Days passed one after another in silence, and Ko became known as Pungoree, the dumb man, smitten by the spirit for an act of blasphemy; but in Ko's mind were other visions, visions of money now to be made freely for his mouth was stopped, and the faithless wife and the little boy were sure to be his, when ten years of silence had passed him over.

Three years of dumb wandering proved to Ping-yang the power of this mountain shrine. The keeper made his fortune, for the sick and lame and blind came daily to sacrifice and pay tribute to him. They would ask, "Do you think the god that lives here is able to do what I want?"

In the third year there came tidings to the deaf ears of Ko. He heard that the little boy with the almond eyes and the yellow skin, his precious son, who lived over the walls in the city, was dead. There was no longer hope of the mother, and no meaning in the oath that he had taken to be dumb. He decided to break away, but here also was a difficulty. To simply begin speaking would be contrary to Oriental methods; he could never do so, so he made his way that afternoon to the home of a medicine man, or sorcerer, that lived on the river bank. The man's name was Quik and his business was to put needles into people, then speak a prayer and make them well. He knew the dummy Ko and looked out on him as he came. "Well," said he, "what can I do for a man that cannot speak?"

Ko motioned him aside, and then to his amazement said in a whisper, "I'm not dumb at all, but have pretended for these three years, and now I want to give it up, but can't without excuse. If you will put me through an operation, and cure me in the eyes of the town, you'll make you a name and a fortune."

Quik forgot his shock of surprise in the thought of this most excellent scheme. He would announce to-morrow as his sacrificial day and call all the town. A sacrifice to the gods in Korea equals a quilting bee, a barn raising and a municipal election all in one. There is always much to eat and much to drink, and a babel of voices indescribable.

At Dr. Quik's house there was a multitude of small tables, a foot or so high, and as large round as a flour barrel, loaded down with boiled rice, meat, whiskey, soy, stewed sea-weed, fancy confectionery, all ready for the sacrifice. He had hired professional weepers, and they came in and bowed before the tablet and bawled out, "I-go! I-go! I-go!" with such an accent of distress and woe, that you would actually think their hearts would break; but you need have no anxiety, for a moment later, they laugh, and shout, and turn in and get gloriously drunk.

Such was the show in progress at Dr. Quik's, where Ko was to be operated on for a dumb spirit, that had possessed him three years.

heavy-faced, dull-eyed Ko took his place on the corner where all might see him. Dr. Quik then made a speech, his affliction of Ko, the centurion, is caused by a dumb devil that has taken possession of one of the strings of his neck. It can't be dislodged by medicine, sacrifice, or saying prayers, the only thing for such a possession is a spirit rattle, and without flattering myself, who but dust and ashes, I would still say that I am the only man in Ping-yang who possesses the gift of inserting the same actually. Before the eyes of all you looking noble gentlemen, I shall now proceed."

He put Ko down with his face to the ground and set the needle to work, by telling it, gradually driving it under the skin, where it began to find its way in deeper and deeper. Ko saw stars and meers, and squirmed in mortal agony. After one or two insertions, a pass, and a mysterious word to the demon, Ko swung back on his knees and suddenly shouted in instant voice, "I can talk—I can talk!"

So, by virtue of this great physician, the spell had been broken, and Ping-yang was electrified with the news that Dr. Quik had cured centurion Ko. With one accord the company called the town band, composed of some six players, and had them parade the streets with pipes, and psalms, and flags, shouting the praises of the spirit doctor. For three days and the nights the celebration continued, till the whole town to its farthest limits knew of and Quik's name and fame were established forever.

A Little Book of Blessings

Before Meat is the title of a booklet issued by the United Society of Christian Endeavor. The book, which is compiled by Amos K. Wells, contains the largest and most helpful collection of table blessings ever made. They are blessings for the Sabbath, morning, noon, and evening, for all sorts of holidays, for children, for singing, for guests, for birthdays, public dinners, and many "for any time." There are many by famous authors. Some are in verse. A few are in other languages. There is a practical introduction on methods of asking a blessing. The book is bound in heavy paper binding.

and sold for 25 cents. United Society of Christian Endeavor, Tremont Temple, Boston, publishers.

BOOKS RECEIVED

The Mettle of the Pasture, by James Lane Allen. A singular story, which has been much discussed. Its pervading tone is by no means optimistic, and there are patches of unrelieved gloom in the course of the tale; but its cleverness and brightness in spots make it attractive and enjoyable. Cloth covers; price, $1.50. Macmillan Company, New York, publishers.

Our Neighbors, by Ian Maclaren, from the presses of Dodd, Mead & Company, New York, is a series of characteristic little sketches from this famous Scotch preacher and writer. Very quaint, and very interesting most of them are, and there is a vein of odd humor pervading the whole, which makes the book enjoyable reading. Pp. 341; cloth binding; price, $1.50.

Esarhaddon and Other Tales, by Leo Tolstoy. Translated by Louise and Aylmer Maude. These little tales, which, like the great author's other short stories, are all written with a purpose, were contributed for the benefit of the destitute Jews of Kishinev. Pp. 64; cloth covers; price, 40 cents. Funk & Wagnalls, New York, publishers.

The Spirit of the Service, by Edith Elmer Wood (illustrated); 334 pages; price, $1.50, is a capital story of life in the American Navy. Capt. Cartwright is a heroic character, whose conscientious nature seems to retard his worldly advancement; but he comes out all right and triumphantly in the end of the book. Macmillan Company, New York, publishers.

The American Prohibition Year-Book for 1904, just out, is in its fourth year. It is standard authority on the liquor question, and its hundred pages are full of the best facts and statistics. Every phase of the drink question is covered, and as a source of accurate information it cannot be surpassed. Price, cloth, 35 cents; postpaid, paper, 15 cents, postpaid. United Prohibition Press, Chicago, publishers.

The Twenty-One Wonders of the World, by Sara S. Sharp. This is a most interesting and instructive compilation, the "Wonders" being finely illustrated, and lucidly explained in the letter-press which accompanies the pictures. There are fourteen excellent illustrations, and all the twenty-one articles are contributed by men prominent in the Protestant Church. The book may be ordered of the author, Sara S. Sharp. Price, 75 cents.

The Modern Age (Part II. of "Medieval and Modern History"), by Philip Van Ness Myers (Boston and London, Ginn & Co. publishers) is a volume of 650 pages, copiously illustrated with colored maps. This is the companion volume to The Middle Ages, and its record of events brings the reader from the beginning of the Reformation up to the present time. A most valuable aid to students and the general reader. Cloth covers.

Sunny Memories of Three Pastorates, with a selection of Sermons and Essays, by William Elliot Griffis, D.D., L.H.D. So much of Dr. Griffis' life has been spent in Japan, that this book might well have been filled with Japanese memories; but he has very sunny memories of American cities, which he relates in his brightest manner. It is a matter of interest to readers of this journal that it was the late Dr. Talmage who was his pastor and counsellor when he gave himself to the work of the ministry. Pp. 310; published by Andrews & Church, Ithaca, N.Y.

The Aristocracy of Health, by Mary Foote Henderson. A Study of Physical Culture, and of "our favorite poisons," (tea, coffee, tobacco, alcohol, etc.) A well written book, which should make profitable reading for the multitude. The author states her purpose to be to help "make the life of some one broader, fuller, and happier." Especially instructive are the chapters on alcohol and tobacco, and the mass of evidence which has been industriously collected, and which is here ably presented as an argument against their use. 772 pages, cloth binding. Coltar Publishing Co., Washington, D.C.

A MORNING HYMN

ETERNAL Father! Throned in heaven high,
Yet to thy feeble children always nigh;
We rise to bless thee for the morning light,
And all thy tender care throughout the night.

Strong Son of God! Who, ere creation's morn,
Before the angels or the worlds were born,
To die for sinners wast ordained; O may Thy precious blood wash all our sins away.

Spirit Divine! Thou Heavenly Light and Fire;
With holy zeal our hearts and lives inspire;
Guide, guard, control; allay our needless fears;
Revive our hope, and wipe away our tears.

Thrice Holy Trinity! Thou Three in One,
Whose love eternal, like the circling sun,
Sweeps round our sinful world; for this we pray,
That all the world may see a heavenly day.

The Bible

THIS book contains—the mind of God, the state of man, the way of salvation, doom of sinners, and happiness of believers. Its doctrines are holy, its precepts are binding, its histories are true, and its decisions are immutable. Read it to be wise, believe it to be safe, and practice it to be holy. It contains light to direct you, food to support you, and comfort to cheer you. It is the traveler's map, the pilgrim's staff, the pilot's compass, the soldier's sword, and the Christian's charter. Here paradise is restored, heaven opened, and the gates of hell disclosed. Christ is its grand spirit, our good its design, and the glory of God its end. It should fill the memory, rule the heart, and guide the feet. Read it slowly, frequently, prayerfully. It is a mine of wealth, a paradise of glory, and a river of pleasure. It is given you in life, will be open at the judgment, and be remembered forever. It involves the highest responsibility, rewards the greatest labor, and condemns all who trifle with its holy contents.—(Rev. W. M. Anderson.)

A Revival in Bethel, Conn.

Mr. J. S. Mayhew, Bethel, Conn., writes: "Fifty persons have confessed Christ during last summer and fall, through the efforts of Miss Mae Lord, an evangelist sent here by the Connecticut Bible Society. This is a small school district, with thirty-five houses, where there was but one family that attended church regularly. Now Sabbath mornings many people can be seen going to the village of Bethel to attend church. Miss Lord is now working in Bethel Center, where there have been already sixty-five converts in two weeks. Most of them are faithfully striving to see who can best work and best agree."

PAGAN TRIBES OF NIGERIA

IN a recent description of the tribes of Nigeria, Africa, Lady Lugard, wife of the High Commissioner, Sir Frederick Lugard, relates some remarkably interesting facts. She said that Borgu, the westernmost province of Nigeria, when her husband first entered the country, boasted that no white man ever came out of it alive. In connection with the occupation of Borgu her husband had curious adventures, and on one occasion put his life absolutely in the hands of Kiama, the King, who had, he knew, been plotting to kill him only a few days before. The upshot was that the king became his fast friend, and having advised him never again to trust a Borgu man as he had trusted him, had shown himself ever since worthy of trust. He still sent yearly offerings to his "friend," and Borgu gives them no trouble. In addition to the Fulani and Haussa races, who spoke either Arabic or Haussa, the country teemed with local tribes having each their own habits and their own language. Haussa was the first language which the English officer learned, but he had to learn many others if he wished to make himself fully understood by the native peoples with whom he had to deal.

Many of the tribes were pagans, and it was not very long since some were cannibals. One tribe was reported to have tails. There was another which would appear to justify the Greek legend of the Amazons; all their public fighting was done by women, and their public offices were also filled by women. She was told, but could not vouch for the accuracy of any of these statements, that in that tribe the women were physically larger and stronger than the men. In the worst of the pagan regions civilized trade was not at present possible. In Borgu the people claimed that they had never been conquered by the Fulani, and they had traditions of a religion which would appear to be Christian.

Speaking of the slave trade, Lady Lugard said that at the time of the transfer to Britain, the principal currency of Nigeria was in slaves. Large sums were reckoned not in pounds, but in slaves; public tribute was paid in slaves, and all labor was slave labor. The result of the slave trade was seen in depopulation. Where Barth described in 1854 a population of 50,000,000 there were probably not more to-day than 10,000,000 or 12,000,000. Yet so wedded were the Fulani rulers to the system that when, on the assumption of power by the British Government, the Emir of Bauchi was remonstrated with and asked to give pledges of abstaining from slave raiding for the future, his reply was, "Can you stop a cat from mousing? When I die I shall be found with a slave in my mouth."

A Queer Marriage Ceremony

Among the Kherrias of India the marriage ceremony is quite elaborate. After many preliminaries the priest begins this singular performance: Taking a small portion of the hair of the bride and groom in turn from the centre of the forehead, he draws it down on to the bridge of the nose. Then, pouring oil on the top of the head, he watches it carefully as it trickles down the portion of hair. If the oil runs straight on to the tip of the nose their future will be fortunate, but if it spreads over the forehead or trickles off on either side of the nose bad luck is sure to follow. Their fortunes told, generally to their own satisfaction, the essential and irrevocable part of the ceremony takes place. Standing up side by side, but with faces strictly averted, the bride and bridegroom mark each other's forehead with "sindur" (vermilion). Great care is always taken that neither shall catch a glimpse of the other during this important process which finally makes the couple man and wife.

Funeral Flowers

A peculiar sacredness hallows funeral flowers. They are brought in lavish profusion to the house of mourning. In the home where the silent sleeper lies in the casket, there are massed roses and lilies, carnations and violets, sheaves of golden wheat and garlands of beautiful autumn leaves. The very last thing that love can do is to bring flowers as a votive tribute to the coffin and the grave. Through wintry days these souvenirs of affection lie withered on the frozen earth, mutely symbolizing the hopes that have been blighted by the chill touch of death.

But they do more than this. Words are poor, but flowers are eloquent. They voice sorrow and sympathy and a faith that rifts the darkness of the tomb, and sees "sweet fields beyond the swelling flood all dressed in living green." No death there, for this mortal shall have put on immortality, and the flowers by the river of life bloom on forever in the summer land of heaven.

Mrs. Ruth Lord passed away lately, at her home in Lowell, Me., after a well-spent life of eighty-seven years. She was born in Berwick, Me. in 1816. In 1836 she was married to Isaiah Lord who died twenty-one years ago. They had eight children; and four sons are still living. Mrs. Lord was always an industrious housewife, and in her pioneer life her loom and wheel were heard from early morn till sunset. The closing hours of her life were bright with happiness. Shortly before her death she called the family to her bedside, giving them good counsel. Then, in fullest joy, she sang several hymns. Just before passing away, she said, "It is thus is dying, it is glorious!"

Deafness Overcome

A Device That Is Scientific, Simple, Direct, and Instantly Restores Hearing in Even the Oldest Person—Comfortable, Invisible and Perfect Fitting.

190 Page Book Containing a History of the Discovery and Many Hundred Signed Testimonials from All Parts of the World—SENT FREE.

The True Story of The Invention of Wilson's Common Sense Ear Drums Told by George H. Wilson, the Inventor.

I was deaf from infancy. Eminent doctors, surgeons and ear specialists treated me at great expense and yet did me no good. I tried all the artificial appliances that claimed to restore hearing, but they failed to benefit me in the least. I even went to the best specialists in the world, but their efforts were unavailing.

My case was pronounced incurable! I grew desperate; my deafness tormented me. Daily I was becoming more of a recluse, avoiding the companionship of people because of the annoyance my deafness and sensitiveness caused me. Finally I began to experiment on myself, and after patient years of study, labor and personal expense, I perfected something that I found took the place of the natural ear drums, and I called it Wilson's Common Sense Ear Drum, which I now wear day and night with perfect comfort, and do not even have to remove them when washing. No one can tell I am wearing them, as they do not show, and as they give no discomfort whatever, I scarcely know it myself.

With these drums I can now hear a whisper. I join in the general conversation and hear everything going on around me. I can hear a sermon or lecture from any part of a large church or hall. My general health is improved because of the great change my Ear Drums have made in my life. My spirits are bright and cheerful. I am a relieved, changed man.

Since my fortunate discovery it is no longer necessary for any deaf person to carry a trumpet, a tube, or any other such old-fashioned makeshift. My Common Sense Ear Drum is built on the strictest scientific principles, contains no metal, wires, or strings of any kind, and is entirely new and up to date in all respects. It is so small that no one can see it when in position, yet it collects all the sound waves and focuses them against the drum head, causing you to hear naturally and perfectly. It will do this even when the natural ear drums are partially or entirely destroyed, perforated, scarred, relaxed, or thickened. It fits any ear from childhood to old age, male or female, and aside from the fact that it does not show, it never causes the least irritation, and can be used with comfort day and night without removal for any cause.

With my device I can overcome deafness in any person, no matter how acquired, whether from catarrh, scarlet fever, typhoid or brain fever, measles, whooping cough, gatherings in the ear, shocks from artillery, or through accidents. My invention not only overcomes, but at once stops the progress of deafness and all roaring and buzzing noises. The greatest aural surgeons in the world recommend it, as well as physicians of all schools. It will do for you what no medicine or medical skill on earth can do.

I want to place my 190-page book on deafness in the hands of every deaf person in the world. I will gladly send it free to anyone whose name and address I can get. It describes and illustrates Wilson's Common Sense Ear Drums and contains bona fide letters from numerous users in the United States, Canada, Mexico, England, Scotland, Ireland, Wales, Australia, New Zealand, Tasmania, India, and the remotest islands. I have letters from people in every station of life—ministers, physicians, lawyers, merchants, society ladies, etc.—and tell the truth about the benefits to be derived from my wonderful little device. You will find the names of people in your own town and state, many whose names you know, and I am sure that all this will convince you that the remedy for deafness has at last been solved by my invention.

Don't delay; write for the free book to-day and address my firm—The Wilson Ear Drum Co., 1611 Todd Building, Louisville, Ky., U. S. A.

WALKING UNDER THE HUDSON

WITHIN a few hours after the completion of the newly constructed wonderful tunnel under the Hudson River, from Jersey City to New York, a party of engineers and newspaper men—forty-two in all—partly walked and partly rode through the "submarine tube." They had an exciting experience. A writer on the New York Herald gives this account of the journey:

The party soon looked like amateur sailors. Taking off shoes, overcoats and hats they donned long rubber boots with flaps extending to the waist, oilcloth jackets and caps. There were heavy flannel pieces in the hats to cover the ears and attach under the chin.

"Don't cover your ears when you get into the tunnel," was the warning given by one of the engineers present. "You must not touch your ears at all when you get into the compressed air. If your ears start to ache hold your noses and blow as hard as you can, so as to make a pressure back of the ear drum to equalize the pressure from the outside, and then swallow as much and as often as possible."

Mr. McAdoo and Charles M. Jacobs, chief engineer of the company, led the way to the elevator. The men went down by instalments. At the Jersey City end only about half of the tube is visible, as the lower portion is choked with mud. The height in the centre is only about seven feet, rounding off on either side. The atmosphere was damp, oppressive and musty. Upon a very narrow track on the southern side of the tunnel stood a train prepared for the company, with flat cars, a couple of feet wide covered with burlap for the occasion. A glance forward revealed rows of electric lights at intervals sufficient to dispel the black gloom, though by no means making the place bright.

The signal for starting was given and the train moved slowly along the slight declivity, going on and on under the river. After traveling sixteen hundred feet by trolley, the party alighted at the main air lock, which blocks the tunnel. Through a little oval iron door a dozen men crawled, seating themselves on pipes in a small compartment inside. The door was then closed, and those who were left behind heard a roar of wind like a cyclone, making conversation impossible for the time being.

As quickly as possible other groups of the sightseers were placed in the lock, where the sensation was most unpleasant. It felt as though one were starting in a submarine craft, with waves thundering overhead. There seemed to be a rocking motion as the lever was pulled, and the pressure of the air increased, and it was difficult to realize that one was remaining absolutely still deep down beneath a river teeming with traffic. The noise was infernal, and the pressure on the ear drums made them ring unpleasantly. Somebody tried to talk, but his voice sounded so queer and the effect was so great that he soon desisted. Most of the party kept their jaws in constant motion with chewing gum, which had been suggested as a good preventative of ear trouble, as the increase in saliva makes it easier to keep on swallowing.

Suddenly one of the men sank to his knees on the floor. Perspiration was streaming down his face and there were tears in his eyes.

"I'm in terrible pain," he moaned. "My ears ache so I can't stand it."

He was urged to hold his nose, close his mouth and blow; but this did not seem to relieve him to any marked extent. Dr. Loomis, who was present, started to work over him, and he was able to continue, though he had a thorough case of the "bends" afterward, and he had to be carried out of the tunnel.

It seemed like a very long journey in the lock when the iron door on the New York side was finally opened and those inside had a chance to step out into another section of the tube. Here the construction of the arch differed and the walls were of iron instead of cement. There were still two tracks, but there were no cars in sight, and the party had to proceed on foot. There was little talking done as the men walked; the voices sounded unnatural whenever they were raised and the strain was very great. The pressure seemed less than in the lock, though it gave a peculiar sensation.

It was very warm in the tunnel, and most of the men were bathed in perspiration. The splashing of their feet made almost the only sound heard as they continued to advance. They passed another lock, and finally reached the point where the junction had been made by the men working on the opposite sides.

In all of the dynamiting and boring, not only had there been no deaths, but not one of the workmen had even lost a finger. There was reason for pride in the accuracy of the engineers' calculations, as the two sides of the tunnel had joined perfectly.

The rest of the strange journey was without incident. The ascent to the New York pier was made by elevator. The lift was sixty-four feet through a circular metal funnel. At the top there was some delay on account of the air pressure, and when the door was finally opened, a blinding steam resulted as the hot air met the surface atmosphere.

Pennsylvania Railroad, Account General Conference, Methodist Episcopal Church.

On account of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, to be held at Los Angeles, Cal., beginning May 3, the Pennsylvania Railroad Company will run a personally-conducted tour to Los Angeles, visiting the Grand Canyon of Arizona en route, at unusually low rates. A special train of the highest grade Pullman equipment will leave New York, Philadelphia, and Pittsburgh on Wednesday, April 27, running via Chicago and the Santa Fe Route to the Grand Canyon. Sunday will be spent at this wonderful place, and Los Angeles will be reached on the evening of May 2. Round-trip tickets, including transportation, one berth, and meals on special train going; and transportation only returning on regular trains via Detroit or via San Francisco, will be sold at the rate of $106 from New York, $105 from Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, and $100 from Pittsburgh. Tickets will be good to return at any time before June 30. Tourists returning via St. Louis may stop off for ten days to visit the World's Fair, by depositing ticket and paying $1.00. A descriptive itinerary will be sent on application to Geo. W. Boyd, General Passenger Agent, Broad Street Station, Philadelphia, Pa.

LYDIA JANE to AUNT JERUSHY

Dear Aunt Jerushy:

I HAD a thot that you woud a writ and told me what I read in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD about you and your naibor, Sary Elizabeth, not comin' to see me on redused rates, for the holidyay trip. I can't scold you, for you done noble in givin' the money it would 'a cost you and Sary Elizabeth, to that starved crowd of men at the Bowery Mission. If you could 'a got here without that money, I would 'a took you to that wonderful mission. I hain't so very well acquainted with them noble workers in that mission, but I tell you two sisters, you better be savin' up and git there some time.

Good Mother Bird is a dear friend of mine. Nobody knows all she's give up, and is givin' up all the time to feed the souls and boddies of them poor, starved critters. No homes—they must walk the streets all night, for the police tells 'em to move on if they stop. They are glad to jine the crowd for hot coffee and bread. All these bitter cold nights, hundreds of men have stood as near the Bowery Mission as they could git. Men would work inside maken barrells of coffee and hundreds of sandwiches. At one o'clock, them doors would open. Almost frozen stiff, each man would git a big bowl of ste'min' coffee, slices of bread and meat and then they didn't mind waitin' for that cold mornin' to open, for at three o'clock they had to leave that place.

Oh, Aunt Jerushy, do send some money! Such a pile it has took all winter—people don't know about it, and crowds go there every evening to sing, pray, and learn how to be better men.

Do pray for God to bless dear Mother Bird, an' the good Superintendent and the helpers, for they are doin' God's real work. Stop all your women goin' on trips for a few times; jest send the money to the Bowery Mission.

Your friend, LYDIA JANE.

Revival in a Seminary

Seattle Seminary, which opened twelve years ago, is a Missionary Training School and an Institution of high academic grade. The spiritual influences are so strong, that nearly all the young people become Christians before they have attended any length of time. There have been wonderful revivals in connection with the work, from the beginning. During chapel exercises, two years ago, fourteen young people professed conversion. This year has been no exception. A most remarkable revival spirit is felt throughout the entire institution. About one hundred students have confessed Christ during the past four weeks, and the spiritual awakening is becoming deeper and more general. Missionaries have been sent out to Japan, China, India, Africa and other places during these twelve years. The attendance has increased until the two spacious buildings on the campus are inadequate to accommodate the young people applying for admission. President Rev. Alexander Beers, is now planning for a new administration building, to cost, when completed, $30,000, which will furnish accommodations for 400 or 450 students. Mr. Beers feels confident that the money will be forthcoming, and that it will soon be crowded with young people who are preparing themselves for the Master's work.

A Real Surprise

I have received your valuable and highly finished copy of How I Worked My Way Around the World. It was a real surprise and a true pleasure in every way, and I can only say with numbers of your subscribers, "How can you persevere in doing so much?" Japan was in my heart, and so to it I turned at once! And I got clearer ideas of the land and its surroundings than I ever had before!

A SONG OF EASTER

THE starry hosts had said good night,
The sun had burst to day,
When lo! a messenger from God,
Had rolled the stone away.
Through the long night the angels watched,
In holy vigils round the tomb,
Until the risen Christ came forth,
Clothed in immortal bloom.

The mighty Christ had come to life,
His voice had rent the grave,
And death and hell are vanquished foes;
He shows his power to save.
Our Christ indeed is risen now,
The stone is hurled that sealed the tomb;
He's risen and has vanquished,
The everlasting gloom.

Christ is risen! King of saints!
Our Messianic Lord!
The pledge of all the holy dead,
In him to be restored.
Ye mighty hosts in white array,
Throw wide your gates on high,
And let the conquering Christ come in,
Who nevermore shall die!

The Taffy Pull

Karo

is far superior to any other syrup for taffy or candy of any kind. Try the following recipe. It is convincing.

Pour a small tin of Karo Corn Syrup into a kettle holding four times the amount of syrup used and boil over a slow fire for half hour, stirring all the time to prevent boiling over and burning. When a little dropped in cold water becomes hard, snappy, add 1/4 of teaspoonful of carbonate of soda, stir quickly and thoroughly then pour on greased platters. When cool enough to handle without burning the hands, pull. A little butter rubbed on hands will keep it from sticking. The more it is pulled the whiter it becomes. Flavor to suit.

Karo Corn Syrup is good for all home uses from griddle cakes to candy. Sold in airtight, friction-top tins, 10c, 25c, 50c. All grocers.

Answered Prayers

A PRAYER

BLESSED Jesus, may we ever
Feel thy presence and thy power;
Keep thou us amid life's tumult,
Every day and every hour;
Make us stronger for the conflict
With the mighty hosts of sin,
Till through thee we gain the victory,
And to rest may enter in.

When our hearts, oppressed and weary,
Stagger 'neath our heavy load,
May we think no other pilgrim
Ever trod so drear a road
As did'st thou, when, lone and friendless,
Thou did'st die that we might gain
Life eternal, sealed and purchased
By the Lamb on Calvary slain.

Blessed Jesus, draw us closer,
Closer to thy pierced side,
And if need be, in the shadow
Of thy cross may we abide,
'Till we see our burdens lighten,
In comparison with thine,
And we catch the inspiration
Of thy life and death divine.

And in fuller consecration,
May our lives to thee be given,
That by precept or example,
We may win some soul for heaven;
Some soul that through eternity
Shall sing that wondrous song,
Which through the years that have no end
The ransomed will prolong.

LETITIA WILEY TODD.

North Haven, Conn.

Mrs. E. J. H., California. "I want to add my testimony in regard to the many, many times that I have had answers to prayer. I know that God does answer prayer, for he is faithful that promised."

H. M., New York. "I wish to acknowledge, from personal experience, that God answers our prayers and gives us what is best and right for us when we come to him in the right spirit, trusting in him."

A. R. C., Merchantville, N. J., writes: "I wish to thank God for an answered prayer. A clipping from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was one of the instruments, through God, of bringing about the answer to my prayer."

Believer in Prayer. "God be praised for the Answered Prayer column. He has recently answered my prayer for a great temporal need. How much more willing he must be to grant spiritual gifts."

Reader, Westfield, Pa. "I wish to express my gratitude to God for prayers answered. My heart is filled with thankfulness, and I praise God for his goodness."

S. A. B., Syracuse, N. Y. "God has answered my prayer. Recently I promised if he would grant me one request, I would acknowledge it to the world."

F. M. H., Spokane. "I wish to add my testimony to the efficiency of prayer. It would be impossible for me to tell all the answered prayers I have had. Should anyone doubt that God does not hear a heartfelt prayer, let them try, and test it as I have done."

M. A. F., Grand Rapids, Mich. "I prayed for a dear one. My prayer has been answered. Time and patience, with strong faith, are needed. Praise be to God, he knows what is best."

W. M. S., Cross Village, Mich. "I, too, wish to acknowledge publicly God's goodness to me in answering my prayers. Many times, when so troubled, I looked to him in prayer and he never has failed to answer them. Bless his holy name."

Michigan Teacher. "I ask through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the prayers of some of those who have acknowledged their prayers through that paper, that I may love the dear Saviour."

G. S. C., New York. "I wish to acknowledge that God has graciously answered my prayers in several special cases in the past, and I am learning to take all my daily needs to him, both great and small. Bless his holy name."

S. S. B., Battle Creek, Mich. "I promised the Lord if he would answer the prayer I made and relieve my distress, I would publish it to the world. He has heard and helped me. Glory to his name."

Constant Reader. "I was in great trouble. I prayed to God to help me. He has answered many of my prayers. I have had many troubles. The Lord has always helped me. He answers our prayers if we go to him."

Reader, Jordanville, N. Y. "I want to thank the Lord for answering my prayers, as he has so many times. I think he always will if we ask him in faith and do right."

Constant Reader, Texas. "I was in great distress and trouble. I prayed earnestly to my Heavenly Father for help and relief. He heard and released me, and I thank and praise his holy name."

Reader, Rutland, Vt. "I wish to answer God's goodness in answering my many prayers. Also in constantly forestalling me. Dear troubled ones, do not carry your own burdens. God loves and longs to carry them for you. Only ask in faith."

PRESIDENT SUSPENDERS

IF YOU WANT CASH

For Your REAL ESTATE or BUSINESS

I CAN GET IT

No Matter What Your Property Is Worth Or In What Town, City, State Or Territory It Is Located

IF I did not have the ability and facilities to sell your property, I certainly could not afford to pay for this advertisement. Like my hundreds of other ads. that are continually appearing throughout the country, it is practically sure to place on my list a number of new properties, and I am just as sure to sell these properties and make enough money in commissions to pay the cost of the ad. and make a good profit besides.

That is why I can afford to advertise. My ability to make quick sales has enabled me to build up the largest real estate business in the world.

Why not put your property among the number that will be listed and sold as a result of this ad? For eight years I have been making quick sales for hundreds of people in every section of the country, and I am confident that I can make a quick sale for you.

I do not handle any of the side lines usually carried by the ordinary real estate agent. I do not make any money through renting, conveyancing, mortgages, insurance, etc. I MUST SELL real estate—and lots of it—or go out of business. I can assure you I am not going out of business. On the contrary, I expect to sell more than twice as many properties this year as I did during 1903.

Eight years of the most active kind of experience, offices in principal cities from Boston to San Francisco, hundreds of special representatives, and an expenditure of over $100,000 a year in advertising, give me better facilities for quickly selling your property than any other broker in existence.

It doesn't matter what kind of a property you have; it doesn't matter whether it is worth $100 or $100,000, or in what town, city, state or territory it is located, if you will send me a brief description, including your lowest cash price, I will tell you how and why I can quickly convert it into cash, and will give you my complete plan for handling it, together with a letter of advice

FREE OF CHARGE

The information I will give will be of great value to you even if you should decide not to sell. Write to-day or fill out and mail to me the left-hand coupon.

If you want to buy any kind of a property in any part of the country, tell me just what you want. I believe I can fill your requirements very promptly and save you some money at the same time. Use right hand coupon.

Subscriber, Blownburgh, N. J. What did Christ mean by telling a man (Matt. 8: 22) to let the dead bury their dead?

Jesus had bidden the man follow him, and he had replied with asking leave first to go and bury his father. It was giving precedence to family affairs. The man's first duty after being awakened was obedience to Christ. Oriental funerals were very elaborate affairs, and the man would be brought in contact with relatives and neighbors whose influence would be detrimental to him. There were, as Christ implied, many who could attend to the duty of burying the dead. The spiritually dead to bury the physical dead. But this man, having come under Christ's influence, ought to give him the paramount place and not suffer any other duty to draw him away. If Christ were on earth now, what should we think of a man who gave up the privilege of listening to him to attend a funeral?

Student, New York. Do certain woods have an affinity or a repugnance for each other? Please name some that are antagonistic.

The only instances we know of are walnut and cypress, or cedar and cypress. When joined together, it is said, they rot; but the decay ceases when they are separated. Some practical carpenter or cabinet-maker will doubtless be able to inform you regarding others.

Inquirer, Richmond, Va. Is there any harm in attending spiritual seances? I have friends who have learned important facts from mediums, and there are some things I want to know which might be revealed to me if I went to them, but I am not sure it is right.

You should stay away. The prophet who wrote long ago to his people: "When they say unto you, Seek unto them that have familiar spirits and unto wizards that peep and that mutter: should not a people seek unto their God? To the law and to the testimony," would give you the same counsel. There are some facts in Spiritualism which science is now seeking to understand and important clues have been obtained, but at present its pretended revelations are foolish and misleading. You would gain nothing reliable by consulting a medium and you would inevitably suffer, as others have done, alienation from God and be subject to dangerous temptations. Ask God's guidance in the affairs of life and do your duty according to your conscience, leaving the occult severely alone.

A New Haven Reader sends us an account of a bull-fight at Juarez, Mexico, just across the border from El Paso, Tex., in which Cuco, a famous matador, was gored to death by an infuriated bull in the presence of a "select audience." The account adds:

Women fainted and left the arena, but several men applauded the act. Cuco was covered with one of the banderillas and carried from the ring. Two conspuives were seized with hemorrhages at the sight and were taken from the arena. Among the spectators were five hundred American women.

Five hundred American women witnessing such a sight! The thing seems incredible. Truly, as our New Haven friend remarks, "it is about time for China to send us some missionaries."

P. V. F., Washington. 1. A friend insists that whosoever breaks the least of God's commands, will be punished just the same as a murderer or a thief. Is that so? 2. The Bible tells us to speak well of all men. Would I be breaking that command, if, in reply to a person's question, I stated what I knew of another, with the object of saving the questioner from being corrupted by association with the person about whom she inquires?

1. Every sin works out its own punishment. The view of God as a judge or king, meting out penalties proportioned to the enormity of the sin, scarcely accords with the teaching of the Bible. The soul that loves sin and is steeped in it, is naturally excluded from his presence. It is the pure in heart who see God. No details are given in the Bible as to the degrees of punishment, but we can imagine that the remorse, which must torture the impenitent, is affected by the character of the sin. The chief and overwhelming distress must arise from the fact, that forgiveness was offered through Christ, and was not accepted. 2. If you are perfectly sure of your facts, it is your duty to put the questioner on her guard. You are not justified in withholding knowledge which may protect her from danger.

Miss Maud A. Where is Macedonia located and to what nation does it belong?

It is not now geographically known as Macedonia, but is divided into several districts or vilayets, including Monastir, Adrianople and Salonica. It is the southwestern part of European Turkey, and lies immediately north of Greece.

Church Member, Portland, Me. Is a church justified in holding a bazaar to raise money for a debt on its building?

Ida M., Bendersville, Pa. What is the Spooner Act, and when was it made a law?

The Spooner Act is the law for the construction of an Inter-oceanic Canal. It was passed June 28, 1902, by the Fifty-seventh Congress, and was so-called in the newspapers, because Senator John C. Spooner, of Wisconsin, presented it as a compromise between the Panama and the Nicaragua advocates. The Act authorized the President to enter into treaty with Colombia for the building of the canal across the Isthmus of Panama; it being provided that in the event of failure to secure such treaty, after the lapse of a reasonable time, recourse should be had to building a canal through Nicaragua.

A WARNING

I have credible information that a company has been formed with a capital of $100,000 for the purpose of enticing girls and women to St. Louis next summer for the basest uses. There is but one way of safety. Let no woman of any age answer any advertisement calling for women to come there. There can be but one reason for such an advertisement, and that the wickedest possible. There will be no call for legitimate employment but can meet by those in the vicinity. The more taken advertisement the more sure the snare. Answer none of them on your life.

Mrs. Sangster's Blue Badge Committee is operating, in conjunction with the good Christian ladies of St. Louis, to baffle this nefarious scheme, and will doubtless succeed. She invites the co-operation of readers of this paper in every city, town and village—mothers, sisters, and daughters. Let them send her their names for enrolment as Local Blue Badge Committees, and she will forward to them necessary information as to local organization and the work to be done. There are many of them. Arizona has one; Florida has several; Kentucky has one who appears and disappears in the Mammoth Cave; Belgium has the river Lys, which disappears out of sight for a full mile; the Meuse, France, runs below ground for six miles; the Dromme, in Normandy, vanishes near the seacoast.

PUZZLE NO. II.

A SAILING vessel on the way to an eastern land, was becalmed near a cannibal island, and was slowly drifting toward the shore. The captain asked one of the passengers to pray for wind. "I will," was the reply, "provided you set sails to catch the breeze." It seemed mere folly to set sails in a dead calm, but the passenger insisted, and the sails were set. Not long after, the captain knocked at the door of the passenger's room and asked: "Are you still praying for wind?" "Yes," was the reply. "Well, stop praying," said the captain, "for we have more wind than we can manage." Before the ship had drifted to the shore a strong wind had struck the sails, the course was changed, and they were saved. The passenger, who has been for several years an influential missionary, says the promises of the Bible are real to him, and that prayer is transacting business with God.

THE TRAVELING BAKER

ARRIVAL OF THE DILIGENCE

The City Above the Clouds

A VISIT TO LA PAZ, THE "ROOF OF THE CONTINENT"

By DAY ALLEN WILLEY

CAN you conceive of a traveler sitting on the deck of a steamboat and enjoying a journey, which lasts from sunrise to sunset, on a body of water two miles higher than the level of the ocean? Lakes above the clouds are not unknown in Europe, or along our own Pacific coast, but in South America, among other wonders of nature, is a great inland sea, which has been placed upon the very roof of the continent, 12,540 feet by actual measurement, above ocean level. Lake Titicaca is over 100 miles in length, contains over 3,000 square miles of navigable water, and a fleet of vessels most large enough to go across the Atlantic with safety, ply upon its waters. These vessels were put together on the shores of the lake, their hulls and machinery being brought to South America, being built by European and American workmen, unloaded at Mollendo, the seaport of Peru, and carried by rail to Arequipa, 107 miles back in the country. Thence they were taken piecemeal to the port of Puno, 200 miles further, there to be completed and placed in commission.

This lake across the great Bolivian Plateau, to La Paz, the Wonderful City," as it is called by the Indians. La Paz is both the capital and the metropolis of Bolivia, and the chief city of the department of the same name. It is the principal market for the plateau, which is an empire in itself, being no less than 600 miles in length and 150 miles in width. Yet, every part of it can be called cloudland, for the lowest portion is at least 3,000 feet above the waters of the Pacific. Were it not for the lake, much of it would be trackless and almost impassable desert.

Arriving at La Paz, one feels compensated for the length of the journey from the seacoast, although on the slowly-moving railroad trains and in crossing Lake Titicaca, usually two days at least are required, to say nothing of the part of the journey by diligence. The vehicle moves along the mountain roads at a snail's pace; but here and there one sees vistas of some of the grandest mountain scenery of the globe, which partly makes up for the discomfort.

Probably no other city in the world is as completely isolated as La Paz; yet it is one of the most active communities in South America, doing a business that is surprising in its dimensions, when it is remembered that the bulk of the traffic is borne on the back of that camel of South America, the lama. There are in La Paz not only pretentious stores, where silks and laces from London, Paris and New York can be purchased, but canned food from the Western packing-houses, mining and other machinery, as well as electrical equipment made in the States, and even European furniture, sea level. Some of the mightiest mountains of the globe surround the Bolivian Plateau. This is why the climate of La Paz, during the greater portion of the year, is agreeable and healthful.

La Paz may be called the Athens of South America, for it has institutions of learning which are among the oldest and most noted on the continent. Among the 75,000 inhabitants are many Indians and half-breeds. Although the majority are anything but attractive in appearance, occasionally one sees features of such intelligence and actual beauty that it is not hard to believe that here is a descendant of the ancient race who founded a civilization hundreds of years before the European set foot in this region.

Extensive ruins are still to be seen on the peninsula, as well as on the "Islands of the Sun and Moon," in the lake itself. There are hundreds of miles of shore where the white man does not venture, as it consists of immense marshes of grass, traversed by waterways which are known only to the Aymara Indians who inhabit it. To be lost in the swamp means death to the European, as it is so unhealthy. The Indians who dwell here are descendants of tribes who allied with the Incas in fighting the Spaniards, and for over a century they remained unconquered in their natural stronghold. They are the builders of the famous grass boats which are used to navigate Lake Titicaca—the only craft of the kind in the world. The reedy grass is cut when green and pliable, formed tightly into long bundles, and these are fitted together as closely as the timbers of an ordinary wooden boat, so that these curious little vessels are water-tight, without the use of cement or any other compound. In these boats the Indians go from one part of the lake to another, and are expert sailors.

It has been said that the hidden wealth of the Incas is not buried in Peru, but somewhere about this plateau of Bolivia. Some of the richest gold deposits in the world are contained in the mountains which surround the plateau. The discovery of the precious metal was one of the reasons for constructing the railroad from Peru into the interior. As yet only a few of the richest

La Paz is like many other cities of South America, with narrow streets and stone-walled dwellings, but it has a boulevard that would be a credit to any community in the world.

A Broken Alabaster Box

A New Sermon by REV. FREDERICK F. SHARMON*

IN two of the most interesting scenes in the earthly life of our Lord, women are the chief actors. One was the memorable scene in the Temple, when the poor widow cast all her earthly treasure into the money chest. Because love was the impulse that drew them out of her hand, Christ has made the music of the poor widow's two mites ring through the ages. She has forever taken her place beside the immortals. And her place is a very lofty one. From that high summit she sheds blessing and inspiration upon the marching generations. Seated by her side is the woman of Bethany. Because love was the golden hammer with which she shattered the alabaster box, Christ also lifted her to a seat on the throne of immortality. On that imperial height she sits forever. Like some denizen of the skies, she draws our faces upward, touches them with the holy light of a great inspiration, and then starts us out anew surging through the soul. Tender, beautiful, thoughtful woman, standing like an angel in the sun of memory, teaching us that in breaking love's alabaster, we are filling the world with an odor sweeter than that which filled the house of Simon!

However beautiful the act of this woman may appear to us, remember that it did not appear so to those who witnessed it. Christ only, was capable of fully appreciating the deed. "There were some that had indignation among themselves." While some were indignant, he was beautifully tender; while some were crying out against this waste, he found a text for a sermon whose eloquence and beauty will never die. While some, with the glitter of gold in their eye, saw only an act of utilitarian value, he saw an aureole of worship encircling her soul. Let us remember this, for what he saw and what others saw, measures the distance between Christ and Judas.

The World's Debt to Woman

Our text brings us to a consideration, first, of the breaker of the alabaster: "There came a woman." What histories, what revolutions, what tragedies, what lyrics, what destinies are compressed within those words of the Gospel minstrel! There came a woman, and ninety-nine out of every hundred volumes of history in the world are written. There came a woman, and the world's master pictures are painted. There came a woman, and the world's great fiction is written. There came a woman, and the world's great poems are penned. There came a woman, and the world's great songs are sung. There came a woman, and the world's great reforms are begun. There came a woman, and Shakespeare writes his first sonnet. There came a woman, and Benjamin West paints his first picture. There came a woman, and Victor Hugo writes his first romance. There came a woman, and Charles Lamb discovers his best friend. There came a woman, and Robert Browning creates his noblest poetry. There came a woman, and Michael Angelo thinks he has seen the face of an angel. There came a woman, and—

The bravest battle that ever was fought!
Shall I tell you where and when?
On the maps of the world you'll find it not;
'Twas fought by the mothers of men.

Nay, not with cannon or battle shot,
With sword or nobler pen;
Nay, not with eloquent word or thought
From mouth of wonderful men.

But deep in the walled-up woman's heart—
Of woman that would not yield,
But bravely, silently bore her part—
Lo, there is the battle-field!

No marshaling troop, no bivouac song,
No banner to gleam and wave!
But oh, these battles, they last so long—
From babyhood to the grave!

There came a woman, and there is emptied on the head of the Son of God, the ointment whose odor is a symbol of woman's love and devotion, which have perfumed the centuries. Yes; there came a woman—not a man: the act were too fine and high for him!

Over against the coming of this woman, set Christ's view of her act. In a company cursed by a chronic grumbler, he would not permit her devotion to be marred. No sooner had the words of the critic broken in upon this symphony of worship, than he said, "Let her alone; why trouble ye her? She hath wrought a good work on me." Like a master musician silencing a discordant player, Christ puts a lock on the lips of this apostolic critic. There are times when the soul rides skyward in the chariot of adoration, keeping worshipful tryst with its Saviour on the Mount of Silence. What a blessed, holy hour! Then the spirit hides in the heart of its Creator as silently as a drop of dew slides into the cup of a violet. If we catch the tender rhythm of angelic minstrelsies, so much the better. Then do we know Christ walks among the soul's seven golden candlesticks of love. There, alone and untroubled, shall be wrought our good work of worship. There shall we break our alabaster of love.

A Service Immortalized

Moreover, while Judas could find only something to criticize, Christ found that this breaker of the alabaster had made the most of her opportunity. "She hath done what she could." Those are words to be cut on the monument of one in a million. How little men make of their opportunity of doing what they can. We have heard the story of the sculptor showing a visitor his studio. Coming upon a curious figure in marble, the face was concealed by hair, and there were wings on his feet. "What is his name?" said the visitor. "Opportunity," answered the sculptor. "Why is his face hidden?" "Because men seldom know him when he comes to them." "Why has he wings on his feet?" "Because he is soon gone, and once gone, can never be overtaken." And into life's studio this fleeting angel named Opportunity is ever coming. Happy the being of whom this messenger may say, after returning to the skies whence it came, "He hath done what he could."

But Christ was not content with merely setting his stamp of approval upon this woman's deed. As indicated at the outset, he immortalized her. "Wheresoever this Gospel shall be preached throughout the whole world, this also that she hath done shall be spoken of for a memorial of her." To-day this deed is recited in three hundred and fifty languages. The centuries have not made it trite or commonplace. Lending a new beauty to the world's art, it has not failed to give a new meaning to the world's worship. The heart's aroma is drawn out by this tender and lovely act. It tells us that good deeds are the coin with which to purchase a place in heaven's hall of fame. A good deed will outlast the stars. Written down by angelic penmen, it will shine upon the lustrous pages of the Book of Life forever and ever. Out of the Orient there comes a lesson worth remembering. Two brothers, Ahmed and Omar, wished to perform a deed which would bring them immortal renown. With wedge and rope, Omar lifted a great obelisk, which was carved over with beautiful sculpturing. With profounder wisdom, Ahmed dugged a well in the desert, planted tall date-palms around it, making a delightful shade for the weary pilgrim. O, dig the well of hope to-day. Dig the well of joy to-day. Plant the good seed to-day. Resting under the cooling branches which spring from your sowing, coming generations shall rise up to call you blessed, long after marble obelisks, pounded into powder by the trip-hammer of Time, have been carried away on the wings of the wind!

Precious Ointment

In the next place, my text reveals the contents of the alabaster, "Having an alabaster box of ointment of spikenard very precious." The ointment in Christ's time was worth about $50. But, like the deed itself, it has grown more precious with the years, until to-day its value would be nearly $400. Indeed, if we compare it with the attar of roses, made in Hindustan, it would amount to a much larger sum. It requires 400,000 full-grown roses to make a single ounce, selling in England "as high as $100 an ounce, or $1,200 for as much as Mary's pound of spikenard." Horace promised Virgil thirty-six quarts of wine for a small onyx box of spikenard. So precious was it that Cambyes included it among the gifts sent to the Ethiopians. But I am not so much interested in its financial value, then or now, as I am in the fact that it represented the spirit of Mary. She gave the best she had. The odor that filled Simon's house was not half so sweet as the spirit that filled Mary's heart. She considered nothing too good for her Lord. Some folks imagine that religion is a kind of rubbish heap whereon they may pile the stuff they can't use. When I hear the rag-man coming through the alley yelling "Rags, Rags, Rags!" he is only repeating some people's estimate of religion. Not so with Mary. The best she had was not too good for her Lord and Master.

Shortly after the death of Phillips Brooks, his oldest brother said to Dr. McVickar: "Phillips might have saved himself, and so prolonged his life. Others do; but he was always giving himself to any who wanted him." Dr. McVickar answered: "Yes, indeed, he might have saved himself, but in doing so, he would not have been Phillips Brooks. The glory of his life was that he did not save himself." Ah! the glory of any life is that it does not save itself. Did not Phillips Brooks' brother unconsciously reveal the hidings of the great preacher's power, when he said: "He was always giving himself to any who wanted him?" Let Mary, Bishop Brooks gave the best he had to God and humanity, and that is why the fragrance of his life filled two continents with its sweetness.

Giving Life's Best

Think of the philosophy of Mary's act. Giving the best we have, we get the best God has. We may sweep all the treasures of the soul around the feet of God; we might send all the heart's love in tides of worship up to him; we might enlist the best of our experience and intelligence in loving, loyal service until he calls us home, and still we would have to confess that we are unprofitable servants. Even the stars are not pure in his sight. He chargeth his angels with folly, and our righteousness is as filthy rags. God's poor is infinitely better than our best.

Go wing your flight from star to star,
From shining world to shining world, as far
As the universe spreads its flaming walls.
Count the pleasures of all the spheres,
And multiply each by thousands of years—
One moment in heaven is worth them all.

Mary not only gave the best she had, she gave it she had. She didn't let the ointment drip out drop by drop. She literally poured it out. She smashed the neck of the alabaster that its contents might flow like the love in her heart. O, the lavishness of love! Turning a miser into a spendthrift, it also transfigures the affections with spiritual beauty. When Andronicus said to Hector, "My hero, thy great heart will woe thee out," she meant that the love currents, pent up in his bosom, rushed forth with a wild and fiery energy that were destroying him. But let human love be fitted with the divine, and pain and drudgery are forgotten in the joy of coming triumph. That explains David Livingstone. Here is this modern edition of St. Paul, brokenhearted, weary, and gaunt, from suffering in the African forests. There he sits by the side of a rude bed formed of boxes, upon which lay his dear wife. Stunned with grief, and weeping like a child, was this hero who dared death, and toyed with danger when the death angel slew his companion. What wail was that that rent the African midnight: "Oh, Mary, my Mary! how often we have longed for a quick home, since you and I were cast adrift!" But such was his love for the Man of Calvary that he choked his grief, going bravely forward and pouring himself out in the energy and lavishness of love for the enslaved millions. Livingstone gave all he had, Mary gave what she had, and both have spanned the ages yet to be with the glory of their sacrifice.

Perfecting by Suffering

Mary also had a beautiful method of expressing love. Much depends upon the way things are done. Manner oftentimes proclaims the man. Judas had no love to express, so he growled. Mary had much love, and therefore, she expressed it beautifully. Our religion made attractive or repulsive as it finds expression in our lives. I spent a morning tramping through Geneva looking for the spot where Servetus was burnt. Reward was not a very high admiration for some of religion of that day. The old Tower in London may be interesting as history, but the religious gloom it sheds upon one is appalling. Notwithstanding the many bright and golden testimonies cut by prisoners upon prison walls, I could not help feeling that a grim and ghastly spirit stalked through that dark era, dealing out death and wasting despair in the name of religion. It was toxicating to wake up to the glad realization that we were some centuries removed from that age. But a new religion, made of fustian and bombast, is no more commendable than a religion that dwells among the tombs. The secret of living a religion whose expression is so inspiring, and at the same time beautiful, is the secret of Jesus Christ. Our world lays claim to nothing so splendid as his rounded wholesomeness. He is the soul's ideal and Master. He alone can draw out of life in an expression that is attractive with spiritual music.

By no means the least important of the considerations presented by the text is the broken alabaster. "And she brake the box, and poured it on his head." Unbroken, the box would have concealed its odor. Uncrushed, the quartz yields not its gold. Unbruised, the flower holds its richest fragrance. What an unplored ministry there is in the broken things of life! My friend was telling me of a singer with a wonderful voice. Receiving the best culture her own land afforded, she traveled in foreign lands in quest of the training of great masters. Years of faithful toil and vast sums were spent in an effort to make her voice reach its most possibilities. At last she returned home to make her debut. Perfect in technique, tender in pathos, r

Along the "Great White Way"

THIS winter has been in many respects a remarkable one. While many parts of the American Continent have experienced a long season of almost unprecedented severity, with a succession of snowstorms and low temperatures, Alaska has had a winter equally remarkable for its absence of snow. Up to a late date in December, very little snow had fallen, and though the rivers were tightly frozen, the scarcity of snow made the usual winter travel on sledges dangerous and in many places almost impossible.

To reach the heart of Alaska, many ways have been devised for carrying passengers as well as supplies. A railroad which is the nearest band of steel to the North Pole, has been constructed through a portion of the territory for a distance of 111 miles, by English engineers, but it can only be utilized for reaching a few towns it thus connects. The people of Alaska have not only beasts of burden to carry food and men fuel at times, distances over a hundred miles, but thousands of those who have ventured into this region in search of wealth have climbed mountains, crossed rivers, and journeyed in some instances fully 500 miles, drawing their bundles of supplies on boards or rude sledges, and sometimes packed upon their backs.

In the territory is located one of the most unique highways in the world, where it meets men of nearly every nationality, most of them drawn to this region in the hope of obtaining wealth. It is a great avenue, no less than 350 miles in length. Only for a short time during the year is the Yukon free from ice, so that boats can be navigated upon it. Even then navigation is dangerous. Frequently snowstorms cover its surface with a crust which usually offers a firm footing both to man and beast. For six or eight months it becomes the main route between Dawson and White Horse, and upon its white surface of solid, unyielding ice, long and weary one, and some who attempt it on foot never reach their destination, but perish on the way of cold and hunger. The river is sometimes swept by high winds, accompanied by snowstorms which form drifts ten and twenty feet deep, burying man and animal unless they are so fortunate as to secure shelter of some patch of woodland on the banks. Here and there a little settlement of a few huts has sprung up, but the shore for sometimes a hundred miles is a desolate wilderness. Upon this icy roadway the longest stage route in the world for passengers and freight has been established between White Horse and Dawson. Each sleigh seats twelve people, but sometimes passengers engage seats on the floor, where they are warmer. At the back end of the sleigh is a platform for boxes and luggage. They are drawn by four or six horses, and if the going is fairly good, a run of thirty miles can be made in one day. Some relay stations are built directly on the ice, and contain stalls for ten or twelve horses, a dining-room, and kitchen. The time required for the whole trip is usually five days, and the animals are kept at a steady gallop where the surface will permit it. Nearly every sleigh which leaves the terminus in winter has now some female passengers.

One frequently encounters strings of three, six or a dozen dogs harnessed to freight sledges, guided solely by the crack of the driver's whip. The journey is a melody, strong in volume, the singer's voice enained like a siren. After the programme had been ordered, and her praises were on every lip, a great musician was noted among the throng. Eager to hear his opinion, a friend rushed up to him and said, "O, isn't she wonderful—isn't she wonderful?" "Yes," the musician answered in a quiet voice, "she is wonderful; but she lacks just one thing to make her more wonderful." "And what is that?" "She lacks a broken heart." "O, the mystery of the gospel of broken things, and yet the glory of it!

What a commentary on the gospel of broken things that book of Victor Hugo on William Shakespeare. While it is the greatest tribute genius ever paid to genius, it is also packed with philosophic reflections of great wisdom and beauty. Over forty centuries ago the gospel of broken things began to be preached on a dunghill. "The whole poem of Job," says Hugo, "is the development of this idea—the greatest that may be found at the bottom of the pit. Job is more majestic when unfortunate than when prosperous. The dunghill Job, transfigured, will become the Calvary of Jesus. Sorrow leads logically to God. The men of genius form a dynasty. They wear all the crowns, even that of thorns." What a tremendous picture is this of Dante: "Where all else ends. Dante begins." Here is Homer, the first song-bird in the morning of civilization, wandering from city to city, with nowhere to lay his head. But into "the vast azure of his mind" drifted all the glory of those ancient days. "When I read Homer," said Michael Angelo, "I look at myself to see if I am not twenty feet in height." Others have made the same mistake. Here is Isaiah, "who seems placed above humanity, and resembles a rumbling of continual thunder. He is the great reproacher. His style, a kind of nocturnal cloud, is lighted up with images which suddenly empurple all the depths of his obscure thought, and make us exclaim, 'It lightens!'" Here is Ezekiel, peering forth from his flowing robes of mystery. His voice rolls like thunder and his pen blazes with lightnings. "Never," says Hugo, "has grander language been spoken by any man of any race, never more extraordinary."

From the beginning, Job, and Homer, and Dante, and Isaiah, and Ezekiel have "learned in suffering what they taught in song. Well does the Great Sculptor know that the heart of stone has to be broken before it can make way for the heart of flesh. The adornment of St. Mark's was possible only through spoils brought from many lands. Wandering through this palace of treasures, the visitor comes upon a serpentine slab from Egypt, a marble column from Syria, a porphyry stone from Greece. So also the soul gathers its spoil from many lands, but from not one does it bring richer treasure than from the Land of Sorrow.

Whatever else we learn from our study, let us not forget that Mary broke her box on the living, not the dead. Dead men neither smell, nor see, nor taste. What nonsense is this canonization of Joan of Arc by the Roman Church. When the pure, white martyr maid went up in her chariot of flames, she passed beyond the reach of earth's withheld kindnesses. When Roman priests and English foes were torturing her in that trial of mockery and shame—that was the hour of her need of ministering hands. But not one single box of alabaster was broken that its ointment might heal her wounded, bleeding heart. O, the shame of it, the shame of it!

How oft we, careless, wait till life's

Sweet opportunities are past,

And break our "alabaster box

Of ointment" at the very last!

Oh, let us heed the living friend

Who walks with us life's common ways,

Watching our eyes for look of love,

And hungering for a word of praise!

The CURE of MIRANDY

By MARY LOWE DICKINSON

It was a sunny room in a low, square brick house, just on the outskirts of a New England country town. It was morning. It was June. Vines crept to the rafters and swayed in the wind. Roses clambered over the porch. Half a mile away in the main street of Fallberg, between a drygoods store and a tin shop, stood another low brick building, with no porch and no vines and no roses. Over its door-way hung a black, gilt-lettered sign—"Robert Moore, M.D." Behind the door a little office; behind the office a tiny sitting-room and bedroom. On the wall of the office, books, and a diploma in a frame. On the walls of the bedroom, more books and a white-haired lady, also in a frame.

From brick office to brick homestead, a long, straight, dusty road. Down it, on this June morning, shambled Aaron, "Aunt Miranda's hired man," and back with him, shortly after, went the Doctor, for Aunt Miranda was having, as Aaron expressed it, "a sort of a kind of a spell."

It was an ill-matched pair of shadows that they cast by the roadside as they went—the straight young Doctor in his summer suit, and Aaron, whose bent shoulders lifted his blue smock frock until it showed behind the "galluses," that gave his yellow nankeen "overalls" a hang and hitch peculiarly their own.

"Sorry, Aaron, but my horse cast a shoe and is round at the blacksmith's. I fancy I can save time by walking."

"Wa'al, jest as you'd ruther. I can edge along putty consid'ble spry, and when I was your age, I used to calklate that I could git to town 'bout's quick's I could hitch up. Besides, I d'know's there's any such tearin' hurry. Ef 'twant for scarin' and worrin' Mildred, I'd jest try lettin' Aunt Mirandy be. But Mildred, she's jest as much afraid the old lady's goin' to go off the next spell's ef she hadn't lived through t'other, but I've an idee that she'll live to worry Mildred into her grave;" and the old man gave the Doctor an anxious look from under his shaggy brows.

"No, no, not so bad as that. We mustn't let that happen. We must cure her. And where a nurse is so fond of a patient as Miss Worth is of her aunt, nursing is not so hard."

"Yes, yes, Mildred is fond of her, and naterally enough. She come right here when Mildred's father and mother died, and while she was a speck of a girl she kind of mothered her; but nowadays the motherin's all on t'other side."

"But what could have made such a change, Aaron?" asked the Doctor.

"Wa'al, the good Lord only knows. S'pose 'twas that tarnal old gray mare that begun it."

The Doctor looked surprised.

"Yes, 'twas," said Aaron decidedly, "and she always blamed me fer it, too."

"Who blamed you? The mare?"

"No; Aunt Mirandy. You see, Aunt Mirandy was real kinder chirpy and high-steppin' in them days. Consid'ble style about her, and Sundays she used to like to roll round the curve and jest sort er sweep up to the meetin' house, and I knew that jest as well's ef she said so; and one Sunday mornin' I see Deacon Fosdick on the church steps. He was a widderer them days, and I used to reckon that ef he hadn't been so all-fired bald-headed, that mebbly Mirandy would 'a hed him; but mebbly again she wouldn't. But when I see him I jest give the gray mare a lick, and she went round that curve by the monermint, the one that says, 'Here lies the dead, that fit and bled,' like a whole tearin' circus. But darned ef the breechin' didn't break, and jest as we was comin' up with a spurt, we went whizzin' out ef that wagon like all possessed."

The Doctor's amused look changed to one of attention. "Spine injured; nervous shock!" he muttered, under his breath.

"Wa'al, mebbly so," said Aaron, calmly, "but the heft of the shock seemed to come on her bunnit and a new yaller parasol that she set great store by. Them two saved her life, though some folks did say they lost her the deacon. Ye see, she jest pitched, head fust, into that canary-colored umberell, and it busted and let the tail feathers of that 'ere summer bunnit clean through the hole, and when they set her up on the ground with that yaller thing shet down like a soup-plate round her face, she was about the maddest and mortifedest creeter ye ever see."

"But were you not hurt? The wonder is, that you escaped with your lives."

"Wa'al, the wagon, that was purty well smashed, and the old gray mare, she gin eout completely arter that, and Mirandy—well, Mirandy's spine got a yank, so the doctors said, but it seemed to me's ef her disposition suffered mor'n anythin' else. From that time she began to hev what I call tantrums, sech kinks in her idees as took all Mildred's goodness to unsnarl. She kinder acted's ef the Lord had wound up the univarse and set it runnin' jest to spite her. Didn't nothin' go right, and the harder ye tried, the more it didn't suit. She talked as ef I had licked that 'ere mare jest a-purpose to leave her onto the meetin' house steps. 'Sef I'd resk my neck and kill the mare and break my bones to spite her."

"Break your bones? Were you injured then?"

"Wa'al, nothin' to speak of—nothin' to mind. Jest one leg and t'other arm, and a kind of general rackin' o' the rest o' the bones. Hain't never stood up straight sence, and it left a kind of a jerk in my walk; but then I manage to edge along and git over the greound, somehow; and that's what we're here fur, I reckon, to git over the greound, Lord knows. Easy enough to go to bed and have a spell, and have Miss Mildred runnin' with plasters and poultices and gruel, and she'd do it too, for a poor, old, hired man as quick's she would for Mirandy; but me nor Nancy—that's my wife—we couldn't 'low it, as long as we could crawl."

"A young girl in white stepped out on the porch"

"Pity you couldn't have put some of your spirit into Miss Mirandy, Aaron."

"Wa'al, I hev kinder hinted round and tried to set her an example," said the old man, mildly. "Twa'n't my place to preach, but once I jist mentioned to the minister that I didn't see how anybody could be so 'tarnally twisted and exactin' ef they hadn't lost their religion, and I kinder let on, that up t'our house there was a chance for some seed-droppin'. And the minister, he jest happened to happen in often after that, and kinder talked and prayed round Aunt Mirandy and at her, and how d'ye think she took it? Why one day she jest broke eout and told him she was much 'bleeged to him for tryin' to help Aaron—that's me—into a more believen' state; that she hed noticed that my infirmities was a-makin' of me kinder waspish and set in my ways."

There was hardly time for the smile on the Doctor's face to sober into professional gravity, when the door of the brick house opened and a young girl in white stepped out upon the porch, and shading her eyes with her hand, peered anxiously down the road. Another moment, and Aaron was left to "git over the greound" as best he might, and Dr. Moore was standing, hat in hand, gazing questioningly into Mildred's eyes.

"You are more than usually anxious, my darling," he said. "I could not come sooner. I had no horse."

"No, Robert, this attack is not worse than usual, but somehow I needed your help more. Auntie has come back from the springs, but—" the girl's voice broke; she turned her face away.

"But she has discovered that I love you. Is that?" he said, tenderly drawing her within the shadow of the vines. "Well, except that it makes it harder for you, I should not be sorry. You know she will have to wait sometime, and I thought it would be better to tell you at first. Do not be troubled. She will not think I have taken you from her, after she finds that I try as hard as you do to make her life happy."

"But she will not see you. She declares you have come here as her trusted physician, and have stolen away her child. She will never see you again."

"Then she did not send for me?"

"No, I did. She frightened me, Robert, with the violence of her feelings."

"She need not frighten you, beloved," Robert went on. "Auntie has been telling me something that helps me to understand her case. Believe me she can be cured, or if she is not"—and his face took an air of decision—"I shall see that my darling is taken beyond the power of her moods."

"Don't call them moods, Robert; she is really ill, and of course I could never leave her, and if she continues to dislike you, you cannot come here. The homestead is hers. She has a right to it, who shall be in it. Grandfather left it so that if one child died the other should have it, and the years before this illness she was a real mother to me."

"But that is no reason why your whole life should be sacrificed to an unreasonable and hysterical old lady's whims. Come, let's go and beard the lion in her den—and he put his arm lightly around her and entered the house."

In a pleasant room, whose window opened on that same vine-clad porch, reclining in an invalid chair, "the unreasonable and hysterical old lady" lay—a comely old woman, too, with bands of silver hair above a fretful brow.

"So you call them whims, do you?" was her greeting. "Well, I will excuse you from any further professional services, for I do not care to pay a doctor's bill for whims. I heard you! I heard you! No, don't answer me; go away, go away, both of you—out of my sight," she said, as Mildred moved toward her with outstretched arms; "out of my house, both, at once. I will live and die alone."

"Oh, Auntie," began Mildred, but the woman glared, while Robert put his arm around Mildred and drew her gently out of the room. "Oh, Robert, let me go back. I must do something for her."

"There's nothing to be done just now. Your presence would only make her worse."

"Go out of my house, both of you; go at once while I can neither hear nor see you" came in angry tones through the half-shut door.

"Oh, Robert, if I only knew what was best to do!"

"Do what she tells you; come away! Be sure it will be the best thing you can do, both for her and for yourself, and for me. Poor old soul! She is not bedridden."

"I jest see Parson Ferris ridin' down there past the gate," said Aaron, thrusting his head in at the door, "and I kinder beckoned to him to come up this way; didn't know but Aunt Mirandy or somebody might find comfortin' to see him."

Before the minister could dismount from his horse, Robert was at his side.

"I have feared for some time it would come to this," said the pastor, kindly, "and yet I don't like to advise."

"Don't advise then," said Robert, impetuously. "Mildred will consent. It is the only way in which I can control of the nervous condition of her aunt."

Slowly the old man dismounted, and followed Robert into the house.

Twenty minutes later, Aaron called in at the kitchen door to Nancy, who had taken care of Miss Miranda as long as Aaron had been her hired man.

"Put on a clean apron and slick up all you kin, in two minutes, not more, or Mildred'll change her mind."

ns have been found, and the Indians know of many pre which they work secretly, for prospectors often one across beds of streams high in the mountains, were the natives were washing out what was practically pure gold, with pans and other crude utensils. It is known that many a lama which is driven into La Paz, loaded apparently with nothing but vegetables or wool, carries also sacks of gold-dust concealed in its pack, which the wily Indian exchanges for "strong water" and clothing—the precious metal coming from some deposit which he has discovered and kept secret.

How many millions of gold the lamas have borne out of these mountains cannot be estimated. The Spaniards used lamas not only in Peru, but in Bolivia, packing the ore through the passes. Although comparatively small animals (the largest seldom being over three feet in height), they are remarkably strong and sure-footed. They will carry on an average one hundred pounds to a load, although they are frequently overloaded and abused by their cruel masters. They are largely used by mine owners near La Paz to carry ore to the city, there to be shipped to the seacoast. A train of fifty or sixty lamas is a common sight in the streets.

THE BABIES' DRILL HOUR

It was at the Nursery and Child's Hospital, corner of Lexington Avenue and Fifty-first street, New York, that I saw the babies drill.

I first visited the nursery, and while there was much that was pathetic, much to make a true mother's heart ache, the little ones seemed, as a rule, very happy and contented, the exceptions being the sad-faced and body-little creatures, whose heritage of weakness and disease had already left its mark upon them. The majority of the babies were rolling about on the floor of the bright, clean nursery, some of them making the most comical endeavors to get upon their feet; some were content to travel on all fours, while others toddled pudgily across the room to greet the visitors. They were all on the move, and not one was crying or even fretting, although there was a very lively "scrap" going on between a couple of year-olds, who were at variance over a much battered rag-doll.

Many of these babies are motherless, but they are all giving better care than they would receive in their poor homes, while those born in the Institution have the mother-care which is their natural right, under the wise pervision of the matron.

The brightest, prettiest baby was a little Japanese girl, about eighteen months old. She can be recognized easily in the pictured babies below; such a sweet, beautiful little creature. Her name is Yebera Ohnishi, the first is Japanese for Estelle, and the surname stands for "A Great Man."

Toddling close beside beautiful Yebera, who is called "appy," for short, was the funniest little pickaninny, most as broad as he was long, with the roundest, lightest eyes, looking as if he had found the world, so far, just to his taste.

One of the schoolrooms and playrooms was next visited, where an elderly woman, who has worked in the nursery for many years, was only too pleased to show off the accomplishments of her "pupils."

Ranging them in a row, they were put through a drill; first they sang a song, then answered questions, as to the name of the President of the United States, etc., then came the calisthenics, which were too comical to be told without laughing. Some of the tots were only two years old, and none over four.

Occasionally a baby's eye would catch sight of an upturned wagon or some toy dropped, when they heard the call to drill, and out he would swoop from the line, bent upon capture, this would start others, and in a moment human nature was asserting itself in the struggle for supremacy and possession among a half-dozen babies. These riotous actions being quelled by a little coaxing, the show went on, varied by occasional breaks from the ranks, as a baby or two suddenly remembered that he had toes, and sat down to try and pull off his shoes, so that he might resume his anatomical studies.

Altogether the hour was well spent at this Institution where babies are "mothered" by the wholesale, while the mothers are given exceptional chance to help themselves and their offspring. The building occupied by the Nursery and Child's Hospital is a long, low, old-fashioned red-brick structure, and a passer-by might wonder at its use. Few, comparatively, know of the Institution, which has had an existence of over fifty years, and has given help and shelter to many sorrowing and suffering souls.

It is ready and willing to continue its work, but its service has of late been growing more and more contracted through lack of means. The building was erected before the Civil War, and was used at that time as a soldiers' barracks. The requirements of a modern hospital have necessitated constant and costly adaptations and repairs. The wards are large and airy, with many windows; about 150 children are born there yearly and many of them, both sick and well, remain there, at a charge of $10 a month, varying in special cases. There are children left motherless and children whose parents are obliged by their work to be absent from home, or even from the city. Sometimes the feeble are to be nursed into health, and when successful, they are the pride of both nurses and doctors. The children can stay there until three or four years old, when they are sent to a similar home in the country, on Staten Island, where they are extremely well taught and cared for, in simple, homely, healthy fashion, and wax strong and sturdy, the health record being remarkable. Three classes of women are received—

First. One or two private patients, having a comfortable private room, and paying $25 a week.

Second. Semi-private patients paying $25 for the whole period of confinement, from two to four weeks, or until entirely well.

Third. Patients unable to pay at all. The latter are obliged to remain with their children for two months after recovery, working in the kitchen, laundry, or helping in the care of the children as seems best to the superintendent. Much valuable knowledge is thus acquired by those capable of profiting by it. Some of the women remain there for years in such employment chiefly for the privilege of being with their children. Of sixty workers at present, all have had children born there, and are staying on to be with them. Most of these are unfortunate married women. Of the second class, there are many poor women who are glad to come here for their confinement, sure of comfort and first-class medical attendance.

Many unfortunate women, left alone either by death or more often desertion, find their way here, and sometimes very young girls of fourteen and fifteen are brought by their unhappy parents, and are tided over their trouble, and later they are aided by every care and discretion to resume their lives.

Owing to the helplessness of the babies and little children and lying-in women, many nurses and nursery maids are required, who receive excellent training which they can later use outside, but they form also an expensive element.

The Institution carries no debt, but gradually much of the building has been closed in reducing expenses and the number of inmates correspondingly decreased. Between the city and country branch an average of five hundred are to be cared for. On the other hand, the support formerly given by the city has been greatly reduced, as with all other private institutions receiving public aid. The present fund is entirely inadequate to replace it. To make the work permanent, and to put it on a proper basis, a large endowment and a modern building are essential. Without them the struggle is most discouraging, and those to be helped are many!

The Institution is well worthy of support. Anyone interested in the work, and wishing to aid it in any way, may address the treasurer, Mrs. F. N. Goddard, 33 E. Fifth street, or 571 Lexington avenue, New York.

A Denial from St. Louis

WE believe in hearing both sides of a question before pronouncing judgment. Some time ago, there was sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from several sources, a very grave charge in connection with the fair name of the city of St. Louis. It was charged—and the charge was publicly printed in many journals—that a syndicate had been formed for a disgraceful purpose, which threatened the welfare of every woman who contemplated a visit to the World's Fair City.

If this were true, it would be a national disgrace and an insult to every American woman, and no measures that could be taken to defeat the scheme, could be too rigid or severe.

We understand that several leading women's organizations have already taken up the cause of the women who may visit St. Louis. Before responding to the appeals made to us, from many quarters, to espouse this cause, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD telegraphed to Hon. Rolla Wells, the Mayor of St. Louis, stating plainly the charges that had been made, and requesting him to inform us whether these charges were true or false.

This is his answer received by telegraph as this edition of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD goes to press:

ST. LOUIS, Mo., March 29.

The Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

Intimations received by you relative to Syndicate referred to in your telegram are WITHOUT FOUNDATION.

(Signed) ROLLA WELLS,
Mayor.

Mayor Wells, the citizens of St. Louis, and the Exposition management are entitled to the fullest publicity for this denial. It is now due to the public that those who originated the charges should either substantiate the same by submitting proof, or withdraw them. In any event, we trust that the publicity which has been given to the matter will not be without good result, and that it will make the St. Louis municipal authorities and the Exposition officials doubly vigilant in the interest of the multitudes who hope to visit the World's Fair.

"Welfare Work"

THIS term is a recent coinage, and refers to the efforts that are now being put forth by employers in many quarters to improve the social and physical condition of their employees, and to brighten their lives and increase their self-respect. In a report just issued by the New York State Department of Labor, the results are given of an investigation into conditions in 108 factories, in which "welfare work" in various forms has already made a beginning. Some of these may well serve as an example to stimulate employers elsewhere to a like generous consideration of the working people's needs. They help to create a better understanding between the two classes, and to foster a spirit of amity, instead of the underlying antagonism which has been so often prevalent in the past. Besides, from the mere view of self-interest, they are a good investment, since they result in better work and better returns.

Among the many interesting features of this "welfare work," a few may be specially mentioned: One large firm of iron-workers has provided for its men a bathing room and wash-house, with shower and plunge baths, where the tired operators may "freshen up." Also warm-water tanks, where their soiled clothes may be cleansed; a "drying closet" to dry them, and individual lockers for all; also a tool insurance fund; a branch library, and a benefit society. Another concern has erected for its workers a large building, containing gymnasium, library, club-room, baths, hospital, and classrooms for free tuition. A third, which employs many women, has established a sewing school, a social hall for concerts and lectures; club-house for men; dormitories and restaurant, flower gardens and field sports, cooking classes, library, and a sick benefit fund. A fourth factory has made its workshops models of cleanliness and ventilation, and has devoted one floor to individual lockers and bath-rooms; another floor, to two great dining-rooms (that for the women having a piano), and a large hall for social entertainments.

While labor is practically the lot of all, it lies within the power of some of us to sweeten it for others, and by considerate and helpful treatment to make the burden easier to be borne. It is a wholesome indication that many among the better class of employers are beginning to recognize this fact. These "welfare" institutions are in line with the advance of Christian civilization, and we trust to see them greatly multiplied.

For Conscience Sake

ONE of the most significant movements of our time is that now taking place in Great Britain, which is known as "Passive Resistance." It is the refusal of members of the free churches—that is churches other than the Church of England—to pay the rate demanded of them for educational purposes. The new law, which places the denominational schools under the control of the Established Church, and makes the support of those schools a charge to be levied on the whole people, including those who are opposed to the teaching of that church, is now being enforced. In every city and town there are men who refuse to pay the charge, and though in many cases they are persons of property and social prominence, distress warrants have been issued against them, the officers of the law have seized chairs or tables, or pictures or silver spoons, have carried them off and sold them at public auction. Last week no less than two thousand persons in different parts of the country thus suffered the loss of their goods. It may be said that the loss was deserved, as the sufferers were well able to pay the rate, but even so, the spectacle is impressive. It proves that at this day, when material interests occupy so prominent a place in life, men are found with a conscience so active, that they would rather lose their treasured possessions than violate its dictates.

When the movement began, it was ridiculed as what is vulgarly termed a bluff. The newspapers and the legal officers said that, when it came to action, respectable citizens would obey the law, and would pay the charge rather than allow the sheriff's officer to seize their goods; but it has not proved so. The number of "resisters" increases day by day, and among them are eminent ministers and laymen. There is no ostentation about their conduct; they scorn to regard themselves, or to be regarded, as martyrs, but there is no doubt that many of them suffer keenly. In some instances, the goods seized were treasured heirlooms, from which it was hard to part; but there was no shrinking, and the goods were taken and sold. We are glad to see that their heroism is recognized by the religious leaders. It is the true martyr spirit, which is not to be measured by the small interest involved, but by the resolute determination to suffer, rather than be inconsistent with principle. Howsoever men may differ about the righteousness of the cause, or the need for the loss, the fact remains that the martyr spirit survives in the church, and there are men still among us to whom the rights of conscience are dearer than their possessions.

Poor Instruments

WE hear a man in the street playing some old melody on a mean and rickety instrument; it wheezes and groans, and the tune comes out in distortions and spasms. A friend at your side says: "That is 'See the Conquering Hero Comes,' and it was written by Handel." "Well," you say, "Handel wrote a very bad tune." "No," replies your friend, "he did not; but it is played on a very bad instrument."

A month or two later you go to the Handel Festival, and there, in the midst of a glorious oratorio—what strain is that falling upon your ear, with thrilling majesty and power? "See the Conquering Hero Comes!" "What!" you exclaim, "is that the same tune that heard played on the old street organ?" Yes, the very same, only now it is performed as Handel meant it to be heard.

There are many men and women all about us who perform God's music upon very poor instruments, but let us not despise them. A wise and Christly sen will recognize the tune, and will know what God meant it to be.

The President and Temperance

BEAR RIVER, CAL.

Editor "The Christian Herald": Now that Rev. Charles M. Sheldon, D.D., has completed his temperance story The Narrow Gate, with the logical climax of the President incorporating in his annual message to Congress, notice "the Liquor Business," it seems to be the rational thing for temperance people to take such action as will warrant the Chief Executive in informing Congress in his next annual message, that there is such a thing in the United States as the liquor business, together with his recommendation thereon.

The well-written story should be followed by practical action. The omission of the notice of the greatest menace to the nation from the President's annual message became so painful several years ago, that the writer brought the matter to the notice of the temperance people of Auburn, California, resulting in a committee being appointed to draw a petition to the President to this end, the plan being to make it a national movement. The matter was referred to State organization, where it rested and died. Again, the writer thought to have a letter placed in the hands of President Roosevelt during his recent tour of California, but in the press the letter was lost.

It is patent to every thinking American citizen that the President should call the attention of Congress to the question that is a menace to the nation, including the liquor business. We, the people, should courteously advise the Chief Executive by petition, that we desire and reasonably expect such notice. Temperance people should take the initiative and see that the thing is done.

Who is the man? Where is the organization, the combination of forces to effectually do it? Such action on the part of the President would give the greatest possible impetus to the cause of temperance.

The greatest foe to our national perpetuity is within our boundaries and specifically in the American saloon. Will he act?

OUR GREAT WAR ATLAS

THE Rand-McNally Company has just published the Russo-Japanese War Atlas and Gazetteer. Last week we offered this Atlas as a special premium to persons who will take a trial subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for nine weeks, at an expense of 25 cents. We also offer it free to any of our present subscribers who will induce four friends to take such trial subscriptions. Even without THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, this Atlas and Gazetteer would be considered a great bargain at 25 cents, and is being sold as such, in the great department stores of New York City. Consequently, every person who accepts this offer, is getting his nine weeks' subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, practically free.

This War Atlas and Gazetteer has so many excellent qualities that, after reading the very complimentary description contained in last week's issue, we find that even now the half has not been told. We neglected to state that the pages measure each 11 x 14 inches, that the maps are printed on paper 14 x 22, that they are beautifully colored, that every point of interest is there in large and easily legible letters, so that every one in possession of this Atlas may follow intelligently the movements of the great forces now opposed to one another.

THE CHANGED SOUDAN

FEW regions in the world show the effect of civilizing influences, coming so rapidly to fruition, as does that region of Africa known as the Soudan. Only twenty years ago the land was dolated under the barbarous rule of the Mahdi, the sive trade flourished, men went about in fear of their les, and cruelty and oppression were rendering the vole region a place of horror. In 1885 the Mahdi ctured Khartoum, which had been held so long and heroically by the saintly General Gordon. The city s given over to the savagery of the fierce hordes ich followed the Mahdi's standard, and Gordon him- s was foully murdered. Thirteen years did the Mahdi al his successor, Khalifa Abdulla, hold sway, during ich Khartoum was almost deserted, and Omdurman rame a centre of terrorizing power. In 1898 the scene nged. General Kitchener avenged Gordon's death, al delivered the whole people from the tyranny of their oressers. Khartoum is again the seat of govern- rint, and a fine college and Christian institute flourish t the spot where Gordon's blood was spilled. Om- dman also has benefited. The photograph on this

She has used the interval to reject both alternatives, and quietly slipping out of the Immigrant shelter, has disappeared, doubtless to find a home among her countrymen in New York. Her disappointed suitor is complaining bitterly of the loss of his money, as well as of his fiancée. Perhaps his loss is not so great as it now seems. A girl who thinks more of a man's appearance than of his mental and moral qualities would not be a desirable wife. In that infinitely higher union, of which marriage is a type, the Christian knows that he is safe, though it may be said of him, "Whom having not seen ye love," for when he does see, he has the confidence of the Psalmist

As for me, I will behold thy face in righteousness; I shall be satisfied when I awake with thy likeness (Ps. 17: 15).

Adults as Children

A novel children's party was entertained in New York last week. The hostess, a fashionable lady, herself the mother of two children, had issued invitations to a large circle of friends, with the intimation that the guests were expected to be dressed as children. She was attired in a short dress, with her hair hanging in was this copper cent. He put the coin in circulation, wondering at the time if he would ever see it again. That was in 1855, and it has come back to him after wandering nearly half a century. If that cent could tell the story of its travels, how it has passed from hand to hand, and what has been bought with it, what a wonderful narrative it would be! That it has come back at all is surprising, but there are more things in life that come back to us than we expect. Some of our words and deeds go forth and we forget them, but long years afterwards, they having borne fruit for good or evil, confront us again. Happy they who can look upon them when they appear, without sorrow or shame.

A good man out of the good treasure of his heart, bringeth forth good things; and an evil man, out of the evil treasure, evil things. But I say unto you, every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give an account thereof (Matt. 12: 35, 36).

A Bequest Undervalued

A probate court in Pennsylvania has accepted as a valid will a letter written by a man to a friend. It appears that a somewhat eccentric bachelor died without leaving any will. It had been supposed that he was pre shows what a busy scene it now is, with its market and bazaars. The population is rapidly increasing, and its wealth and commerce are flourishing. The rapid and permanent change is an illustration of the truth of the wise King's maxim:

When the righteous are in authority the people rejoice; but when the wicked bear rule the people mourn (Prov. 29: 2).

Refused to Marry

There is a grievously disappointed man in the Italian colony in New York. He has been in this country twenty years, and has prospered. Some time ago he came to the conclusion that his happiness would be enhanced by being married. He wanted a wife of his own nationality, but there was no one among the Italians in New York that he considered suitable. He talked the matter over with the surgeon of a ship which plies between this port and Naples. The doctor told him of an Italian girl who lived near his home in Italy that he thought the man would like. The prospective bridegroom was charmed with his friend's description, and authorized him to open negotiations with her when he returned. At the same time he gave him a portrait of himself, taken some years ago, to show to the girl. The doctor executed his commission and showed the portrait. The girl's family held a council and approved the match. The Italian in New York was notified of their consent, and he remitted funds for the passage, and authorized his friend to sign the marriage contract on his behalf. Last week the girl arrived, and the doctor introduced the couple to one another. The man was well-satisfied with the girl's appearance, but she did not conceal her disappointment. Her prospective husband was so much older, and not near so good looking as the portrait had led her to expect. She needed time to decide whether she would marry him, or be sent back to Italy, which was the alternative given her.

long braids down her back. She had also put on a blue cotton pinafore, and wore slippers of the usual child's style. The ladies were similarly attired, each vying with the others in imitating infantile garb. The men were dressed as boys, some in kilts and others in knickerbockers. They spent a merry evening playing blind-man's buff, hunt the thimble, and other children's games. At the close, a feast that would have delighted a child was served. Sugar-sticks, gingerbread, popcorn, ice-cream and lemonade, were its chief features. The party was pronounced a complete success, and all are said to have enjoyed themselves hugely. Some assemblies there have been at which the amusements were not so harmless, but it is plain that even here the participants did not follow the Apostolic example:

When I was child, I spake as a child, I understood as a child, I thought as a child; but when I became a man, I put away childish things (I. Cor. 13: 11).

A Cent Recovered After 49 Years

Recently a Boston journal received from one of its readers, an old copper cent, which had been stamped with the name J. H. Ferguson. The cent had been coined fifty-four years, and it was suggested that probably it had been stamped when it was comparatively new. The reader thought it would be interesting to find out whether the man who stamped it was still living. The publication of the fact has led to Ferguson being found. He is now in the employ of the Lovejoy Electrotyping Company in New York. When the cent was restored to him, he greeted it as an old friend. He said he could clearly remember stamping it. When he was a youth of nineteen he went to work in a machine shop at Fitchburg, Mass. It was necessary to have a steel stamp to mark his tools, and he paid two dollars for one. It was a new thing to him and he amused himself by stamping many things with it. Among them comparatively poor, but after his death his bank books and securities showed that he had accumulated about $50,000. Several distant relatives put in claims for a division of the estate. There was none of them who had seen much of him during his life, and the only friend he had who was very intimate with him was a man living at a distance. He had written to this friend shortly before his death, saying that he did not think that he should live long, and if he died soon he wished his shop and tools to be given to the man who worked for him and that his furniture be given to his servant, and the friend to whom he was writing to have all the remainder of his property. His friend did not think that the letter was of much value, but when he heard that there was no will and that the property was so large, he showed the letter to his lawyer, who told him that it constituted a valid will, and advised him to make his claim at once, which he has now done. A similar surprise awaits many who now hold God's Word in light esteem. They have no idea what a glorious inheritance they might obtain by claiming the promises made therein to all who fulfil the conditions.

Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man the things which God hath prepared for them that love him (I. Cor. 2: 9).

BRIEF NOTES

The statistics of the wine and liquor consumption are made up to June 30, 1903. The consumption for the year closing on that day was the largest on record, viz., 1,666,545,301 gallons, an increase over the previous year of 67,500,000 gallons. More also was drunk in proportion to population. In 1902, the consumption per head was 19.48 gallons; in 1903 it was 19.99 gallons.

The King of England has accepted a copy of a work by Rev. J. Guinness Rogers, a prominent Congregational minister, and has sent a graceful acknowledgment. It is just sixty years ago that a sensation was caused by the curt refusal of the King's father to accept the copy of a work on the Prince Consort's father. The refusal was based on the fact that it was written by a man who was not a member of the Church of England.

ARMIES NOW FACE TO FACE

AFTER two months of arduous campaigning, amid all the difficulties and discomforts of a northern winter, the land forces of Russia and Japan are now face to face near the Yalu River, and the first great land battle of the war cannot be much longer delayed. On March 23, the Dutch ship Buffel, from Kongseng, brought to Shanghai the news that hostilities on a small scale had actually begun. On the 9th of March, as the Buffel reported, there had been sharp fighting west of the Jujon River, in which forty Cossacks were captured by a force of Japanese, and about the same date two Russian squadrons of cavalry had a narrow escape from being surrounded by a superior force, under Gen. Kuroki, and only escaped by hard riding. Sixty were caught by the enemy, but the main body escaped, carrying off their wounded, and leaving five dead on the banks of the Tumen River. These preliminary brushes, though unimportant in themselves, serve to show the nearness of the armies to each other.

On March 24, the Nagasaki correspondent of the London Express cabled the news, that the censorship allowed him to state that "the Japanese War Department had now completed all the details for the movement of the main columns for the invasion of Manchuria. A great force has been massed for an advance on Harbin, starting from the mouth of the Tumen River below Possiet Bay, at the north-eastern junction of Corea and Manchuria. Heavy columns are also concentrated north of Pyeng-Yang for an offensive move on the Yalu River."

Another correspondent telegraphs that the Japanese Commissary Department has laid in supplies sufficient for 90,000 men, in Corea, and that it is almost impossible to obtain more. He adds:

Hence it is supposed that the Japanese intend to make their main military movement elsewhere, using the Korean advance as a diversion. They hold two enormously strong positions at Pyeng-Yang and south of the Miokaksan Mountains, between Hwangju and Seoul. The latter position is probably impregnable. It secures Seoul from attack from the northwest.

It is generally admitted that the Japanese are deficient in artillery, and that their cavalry horses are wretched and have little endurance. Dysentery and pneumonia have prevailed among the troops.

After repeated attempts, it is now asserted that Admiral Togo has at last succeeded, by sinking seven more hulks at the harbor entrance, in effectually blocking Port Arthur. This was done under cover of a prolonged bombardment on the night of March 23. As a former instances, Russian despatches deny the efficiency of the blockade, and declare that Admiral Makharoff's fleet is still intact and ready for service.

Port Arthur suffered heavily by this latest bombardment. The Retvizan was hit again and badly damaged; the Novik was twice struck by shells, but not disabled; Gen. Volkoff's house was demolished, and two guards killed; some big guns were disabled and many Russian residents were killed, including a number of women. One Japanese warship was struck and was compelled to withdraw. All around Port Arthur, on the land side, wire network and other obstacles have been placed to check an attack. Several hundred cars are held in readiness on the railroad, in case the port proves untenable and a retreat becomes necessary.

It is gradually beginning to dawn upon the military experts that the war is likely to be a protracted one. Russia, in the event, will have ample opportunity to bring her vast military strength into the field, and unless some signal victory is won by Japan in northern Corea in April, Kouropatkin may be asked to check the invaders on the Manchurian border. Besides, Russia has increasing hope of being able to get her Baltic fleet to the Far East in time to be of assistance to Makharoff, if the latter can only hold out long enough at Port Arthur.

Dispatches from St. Petersburg now indicate less quietude on the general situation. It is confidently believed that Gen. Kouropatkin, who is now at the front in person, will speedily effect a change in the condition of affairs. There are now 40,000 Russian troops facing an equal force of Japanese north of Antung in Corea. 4,500 Cossacks and Russian infantry crossed the Yalu from Antung recently. 3,000 Russians hold Anju, and there is a force at Chun-ju. The Russians hold the north bank of the Anju River, where they have dug intrenchments. In Manchuria, the army is gradually getting into effective shape. 50,000 fresh troops arrive at Harbin daily, and the health of the men is reported as satisfactory. Vladivostok is reported as quiet, although provisions are running short there. Gen. Linievitch's recent reinforcements in Corea are kept secret. Three weeks ago he had 32,400 men and fifty field guns, but it is expected that he will have 140,000 men by the middle of May.

Russia has frankly acknowledged the recent report of victory on the Yalu and capture of 1,800 Japanese troops. The story came through Chinese sources and was, like many other recent reports, probably manufactured in Shanghai.

Japan's fourth army corps of 70,000 men is now in process of mobilization. It will take the field early in the summer. Gen. Nodda in northeastern Corea, who has now 65,000 men, will shortly receive a reinforcement of 45,000 more. They are now on the march.

At the opening of the Japanese Diet in Tokio, on March 20, the speech from the throne was read. It recited briefly the circumstances which led to the war. The Mikado said that now the nation could not pause with honor until the purpose of the war had been accomplished. He relied upon the nation to demonstrate its practical unity and to maintain the national prestige. The Diet gave evidence of great loyalty and willingness to vote all the funds necessary to conduct the war.

The Moral Pitfalls of the Exposition City

THE W. C. T. U. is putting forth a special work through the Purity department this year at the World's Fair City. Only a small number of Christian men and women realize the tremendous need of this work in behalf of the defenseless young women of our nation.

A correspondent writes, that saloon-keepers are banded together and making an united effort to bring three thousand to five thousand more girls to the city this year. "Three hundred more saloons have recently opened there. With no financial limit, they are calmly determined to carry out their relentless purpose. This vicious organization, whose roots have pierced the entire mold of the famous city, should arouse every Christian to make a ceaseless and earnest effort to save as many girls as possible from their clutches.

"Hundreds of girls are on their way to St. Louis in search of honest employment. Their human enemies are aware of this, and have sent out agents in every large city to lurk about secret places, to entrap the innocent, and to haunt street-car transfers in city suburbs. There are hundreds of shadowy waiting-places in our large cities, where many a victim's screams have been stifled by the moral brigands' hand as they dragged her from safety, innocence and purity, through no fault of her own; while on either side loomed saloons, behind whose darkened windows men reeled and blasphemed.

"The World's Fair City is hollow with pitfalls on every hand. The great railroads do not warn their passengers that danger lurks there in every highway and byway. The newspapers do not cry out against it, for reform is not popular. How will the great army of working-girls know that they ought not to go to St. Louis unaccompanied by a true and trusted attendant, unless good friends are there to meet them? Any girl had better starve, than enter this modern Sodom without friends.

"Girls in search of honest employment, who contemplate going there, should be informed that keepers of infamous houses have a capital of $300,000 to secure new victims for their nefarious business. There are miles and miles of evil dens that cover their dark deeds with a sign, 'Restaurant,' or 'Girls wanted to work.' Many an innocent girl has entered these apparently respectable places, only to be drugged and dragged to a living death. A school-teacher was rescued recently, through the efforts of an uncle, who found her in enforced slavery. We are reliably informed that Russian and Japanese girls are being imported by thousands.

"May God move every Christian heart to reach out helping hand to these helpless ones.

"One was brought in from an Italian slave-holder. Her body was covered with black and blue wounds from the whippings her cruel master had given her. Her curls were matted with vermin, and as the White Ribbon sisters wept over her, she exclaimed, piteously, 'Don't cry over me, but go back and save the other girls there. He has four others who are in a worse condition than I.'

"Mrs. M. E. Otto, of 2813 Lucas avenue, St. Louis, superintendent of the W. C. T. U. purity work. The W. C. T. U. have two excellent slum and saloon workers and one station worker, but what is this number compared with the growing need? The work is skillfully managed inside the Rescue Home. A large number of tract distributors spend two nights each week from ten P.M. to one A.M. in the slums. Through the medium 1,100 girls have been rescued during the past few years. Help given at this time to such a work is greatly in the amount of good accomplished."

OUR HOUSEHOLD CIRCLE

By Margaret E. Sangster

STRIVING TO ATTAIN

WOMEN, especially when young and enthusiastic, are not satisfied to remain stationary. They want to grow, to develop the best that is in them, to make the most of their power and to be of use in the world. This is the secret of the popularity of women's clubs. These delightful social gatherings give women an opportunity for study, mental friction, and for healthful stimulus.

A young girl, the daughter of a large family, where there is continual coming and going, not long ago complained that her whole life was being frittered away in entertaining friends, amusing babies, and going about among her kith and kin. "And I began with such lofty ideals," she said sorrowfully. Well, an old-fashioned ideal for home-making and home-blessing is being fulfilled in her case, and a girl who can make her parents, her brothers, and sisters happy by the beauty of her nature, and the strength of her personality, is to be envied. No outside career offers anything finer than this. I know that in a period of intense activity, this may seem effortless to a woman who feels in herself the capability to guide public opinion, or to achieve success in art and literature.

One of the most eminent women in America, a woman whose name is a synonym for everything noble, said in a group of friends the other day: "I am devoting my entire life at present to my home. I am content there more than I am anywhere else."

Some of us wish for a wider sphere. We feel that if we were only somewhere else we could do far better in a lot of ways than we possibly can just in the little place where we are. But God wants us to serve him, and do our best in whatever situation he has put us, and there can be no doubt that in his love and wisdom he has chosen our environment in the one place on the earth that is fittest for our occupation. At all events, here we are, and being here, in a crowded city, in a schoolroom, in a lonely hamlet, or a cheerful family circle, itself a little community, we have only to do our duty in the station that God has appointed for us. Ideals may be followed anywhere if they are fine and sincere, and they can be no quicker and surer means of flaying a noble ideal than that of being discontented with present opportunities.

An ideal may be a temptation to assume a pose. I knew a woman thus tempted once. She set apart a corner of her room and curtained it for a little shrine. Her table were her lovely good books; her favorite picture hung upon the wall; she retired several times a day to this sanctuary, and spent a half-hour or longer in prayer and meditation. This was right in itself, but, unfortunately, it had a wrong side, for her mother was invalid, and her father a business man with large interests and anxieties. Do what she would, the poor mother could not manage her household comfortably, and keep the peace between the two quarrelsome maids, who were always at strife about the brooms and dustpans. My friend moved around the house in a sort of gentle dachment, with a peaceful inattention to details whichasperated her father and depressed her mother. One day a little country cousin, who made no attempt to be satisty, yet was sweetly unselfish and extremely practical, came there to live, and from the moment she crossed the door-sill, things took a new start, brightening up amazingly.

We must have ideals, but let us watch that they are free from any leaven of insincerity. Persons of an imaginative turn, sometimes pose almost unconsciously. They have before them a vision of womanly perfection, fine, gracious and beautiful, and the danger is that, in striving to reach it, they may overlook the tiny selfish details, the fun, the good cheer and the little kindnesses which form so large a part of every-day duty.

We should cultivate with care a certain largeness of heart and nobility of soul. It is well not to be petty and selfish. One should rise above all meanness, spite and enmities and jealousies. A girl should be capable of friendship that helps man and women, that will not stoop to low devices. Some women, in some moods, are reline. They utter disagreeable things that make people miserable, and they do it not bluntly and boldly, but with a smile, much as a cat puts out a velvet paw and leaves a scratch. Do not, dear friend, be deceitful, do not, even for a single instant, in any company, be less than true, straightforward and womanly.

A Fractured Ideal

"I thought her the soul of honor. She has shown herself the reverse, and fractured my ideal."

The speaker sighed. The lady to whom she spoke said:

"Are you sure that you did not invest your friend with qualities that never belonged to her, that were not really hers, and that existed merely in your imagination? If so, you are not quite fair when you accuse her of having fractured your ideal. It is you who have fractured it, by enshrining it in the wrong niche."

"Oh, well, I can't explain it," replied the first friend. "All I know is that I thought Amy was truth and sincerity personified, and I find that she is deceitful, and now I am utterly discouraged over the discovery."

BESIDE THE MILL

The morn is bright, the sky is light,
The dew is on the mead,
By dale and hill we seek the mill,
Our footsteps haste with speed.

Oh, miller brave, and miller's man,
Of hearts now pray take heed,
For Kitty May, and Betty Ray,
May be of hearts in need.

"You are young, dear. When you have spent as many years in the world as I have, you will realize that no human being is perfect. Lapses come to every one. Circumstances sometimes bristle with difficulty, and temptations throng. 'Judge not that ye be not judged' was the Saviour's command, and it is as impressive and imperative now as when spoken."

A Country Girl to Her Friends

A country girl writes to me, urging that I say a word to keep country girls from seeking positions in cities. She says very truly that five dollars or six dollars a week seems a very good salary while the girl is still in her father's house, but when she reaches town and has to pay for board and lodging out of it, the sum dwindles to pitifully small proportions. If a country girl tries light housekeeping, as some do, she will pay $1.50 per week for room rent. Thirty cents will be consumed in carfares. Meat, bread, soap, bluing, starch, cakes, kindling wood, matches, coal bought by the bushel, will soon foot up to $3.00 more. Very little is left for clothing, illness, or a trip home. City girls who live at home and pay no board can afford to take less money. Three dollars a week for a girl who lives at home is actually more than six for one who must support herself in a boarding or lodging house. My country girl would have her friends stay in the country if they can.

SUNDAY AFTERNOON

If loving hearts were never lonely,
If all things wished might always be,
Accepting what they looked for only,
They might be glad, but not in Thee.

We need as much the cross we bear
As air we breathe, as light we see;
It draws us to Thy side in prayer,
It bends us to our strength in Thee.

MAMMY'S DARLING

SHE was a sad-faced woman, plodding around her work in a never-ending circle. A big family to care for; the washing, cooking, scrubbing, sewing and mending all for one pair of hands to do, kept her busy from morning till night. City women of forty-five or thereabout, exhausted by society and its demands, have nervous prostration and go to a rest-cure. A woman in the mountains, at the same age, has no time for nervous prostration, and the only rest-cure she looks forward to is the grave.

But there was one bright spot in Lethe Armour's life—that spot was her daughter, mammy's darling, little Molly, just past five. A rosy-dimpled creature, with bright eyes and curling golden hair, the prettiest, sweetest child in the countryside. After a succession of eight sons, a girl child was very welcome in the mountain cabin, and Molly, so bright, so merry, so beautiful, was the pride of her parents and brothers. A year had passed since Joe Armour had died, killed by the falling of a tree, so that mammy's darling was now more than ever the comfort of a lonely and grieving heart.

A childless couple from New York were driving through the mountains, tarrying occasionally at wayside inns, and sometimes stopping to rest an hour or two at a home where the hospitality of the region, gave them a seat and a simple meal.

They stopped at Mrs. Armour's, and fell in love with the charming little girl.

"Oh, Ned, if only we might have her," said the wife, "I would so love to take that child and bring her up for my own, with every advantage. Look at the way her head is set upon her shoulders, look at the breadth of brow, the large, soft eyes, the Cupid's bow of a mouth. Don't you suppose her mother would part with her? These people must be very poor."

"I would not dare offer that mother money for her baby. Possibly the thought of what we could do for the child might be an inducement. Yet I hardly think she will let us have her. 'Why not go to an asylum, Charlotte?'"

"I don't want an asylum waif; I want a child like this, Ned."

Very tactfully, very respectfully, the man—a man of large affairs, used to the management of men—presented his wife's petition to the mountain mother.

The color flushed her wan cheek. The gaunt figure grew an inch taller as she straightened herself. The eyes kindled. She shook her gray head.

"Ye mean it kind, sir, I reckon, but mammy's darling will stay right hyar with mammy. We'll do the best we can for her, but there's nothing anyone else can do, that will make up for mother-love, if I'd let her go. Let her go! Why Joe Armour's ghost would walk, if I did sech a thing. No, sir. Thank ye!"

So the rich pair, who had neither chick nor child, went on their way, and the poor woman who was rich in sons and a queen in her own estimation as she surveyed her one daughter, plodded on.

Years went by. Annually the lady and gentleman drove through the mountain land, never without bringing a gift from the great city for the little maiden they had coveted. There came to mammy's darling not a few good things, and later there are coming some advantages that would not have been hers, had not her winsome face so bewitched a chance visitor at her home. But she will grow up to relieve mammy of some cares, and will not be educated in such a way that she must forget her own people and her father's house.

Reading in Bed

The English papers have recently been discussing the propriety of reading in bed. Whether or not reading in a recumbent position is good for the eyes, when, too, the reading must be done by artificial light, is an open question. The fact that a few people have an electric light which may be turned on or off at a touch, does not affect the many who must depend on lamps or gas. A sleepy reader, by an incautious movement, might upset a lamp, and presto! the house would be on fire. Besides, it is a poor compliment to pay a book, to read it that it may put one to sleep.

Bed is for rest, for drowsy eyes, for brains that need repose. A good conscience, fairly good digestion, and a determination to go to sleep, and stay asleep in the proper hours for slumber, ought to preclude reading in bed. The wiser plan is to have a good book at hand, and if one cannot sleep, then rise, light a lamp, make one's self comfortable in dressing-gown and slippers, and give one's book full attention. Read an hour or two, then shut the volume, and return to bed. Insomnia will be routed by that time, and rest will follow.

A sponge bath, hot or cold as one prefers, taken in the middle of a sleepless night, is more successful than a book in wooing "tired nature's sweet restorer."

"BEHOLD YOUR KING"

Jesus Transfigured

By DR. and MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

PRAISE ye the Lord, mountains and all hills" (Ps. 148). Mount Hermon speaks: "The great God, when he made heaven and earth, gathered me up in his hand and lifted me high above my sister mountains. I can gaze on yonder great sea, the Mediterranean, and the waters of Galilee, and another sea of strange interest, the Dead Sea. Winding like a silver thread, I can see the Jordan River from end to end. Dotted over the plains, and spread out upon the mountains, many cities come within my vision—Damascus, Jericho, Jerusalem, Hebron, Beersheba, Samaria, Nazareth, Capernaum, Tyre, Sidon. On yonder grassy plain of Esdraelon, I have witnessed many a battle. I am old, you see, and my hoary head is a crown of snow. My head is often above the clouds, and seems almost to touch the sky. Heaven and earth almost meet upon my summit. Yes, heaven and earth did meet on one occasion. Four men came struggling up from earth below, and two came down from heaven above, and that glad Sabbath day I heard the voice of my Creator! Three of those who came from below followed one who was their Leader. When near the top, he gathered them in prayer, but they were weary and fell asleep. The Leader continued to pray alone, and as he prayed there was a wonderful change in his appearance. His whole body and his garments became bright and glistening. It seemed as though the sun had dropped from its accustomed place and settled on my summit. I shaded my eyes with a cloud, and saw that two others had been added to the company. They stood apart with the Leader, and were talking with him. They looked like the other men, and yet were different. They had brought their glory with them from above. I signaled down the valley to my sister mountain, Nebo, to know if one of them was not Moses, who, more than fifteen hundred years before, had died there. I signaled to another mountain near Jericho to know if the other was not Elijah, the prophet, who had been taken to heaven in a chariot of fire nearly eight hundred years before. They were indeed Moses and Elijah. The theme of their conversation was something which a mountain may not know, but not long after the shadow of a cross arose upon a lonely hill, and I think it was that about which the heavenly visitors talked with the Leader that day. As they talked, I heard another voice from above, saying, 'This is my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased, hear ye him.' It was the voice of my Creator, and he whom I had called the Leader was his Son, who had also had a part in my creation. The visitors from heaven were not alarmed by the voice, they had heard it so long and so often; but the three men who had come up from below fell on their faces. The Son of God came to them and touched them, and said, 'Arise, and be not afraid.' And when they looked up, Moses and Elijah had gone back to heaven, and they saw the Son of God alone. I had heard them ask their Leader to let them build three tabernacles, one for him, one for Moses, and one for Elijah; but now that the heavenly ones were gone, the Son of God led them down again."

Illustration and Application

The Mount of Transfiguration seems to the writer the best thought outlook in the world for viewing heaven and earth, Jews and Gentiles, Old Testament and New, Christ the King and Jesus the Saviour, worship and duty. The boy who could not be saved by those who did not climb the mount should especially suggest to teachers that in order to make this lesson not alone a story of a transfiguration past, but a means also of present transformation of devil-possessed boys and girls, they must themselves come to their classes from the mount of transfiguring prayer.

The place of the Transfiguration was a "high mountain apart," doubtless Mt. Hermon, the highest of Palestine mountains, which seems to greet the traveler every morning as he travels through the Holy Land northward, like a stately marble cathedral, fitting place between heaven and earth, for his coronation who was to be crowned King of all peoples and all worlds. At the base of the mountain there is now a ruined heathen temple, type of declining heathen faiths, near the very spot where Jesus spoke of founding his Church, against which the gates of hell should not prevail—and they have not.

The time of the Transfiguration was "six days" after Peter's great confession, or "eight days" counting the days of both events in Jewish fashion, signifying in each case the next Sabbath. "Transfiguration" should be the Sabbath's weekly gift to us all; a time to climb above the world, and praying be transfigured into his likeness whom we then behold with open face that we may be changed from character to character. This Sabbath is the concluding day of the World's Week of Prayer for the Sabbath. Let us pray and work that this transfiguring institution, now imperilled by selfishness and thoughtlessness, may be preserved for the sake of the home, the church, the Republic, as the only breakwater strong enough to prevent us from being degraded by too great absorption in selfish business and worldly pleasure.

The persons who climbed the mount with Christ—Peter, James and John—were not chosen by rank or riches, except in a spiritual sense. They were lowly fishermen, who had become Christ's spiritual cabinet by surpassing all others in spiritual growth. In character they were richer than others and outranked all in goodness. Three times that are on record they were selected to be with Christ when all others were excluded—in the death chamber of Jairus, here and in Gethsemane.

As in heaven, so in the Church at least, rank should be solely a matter of character. Even in heaven, "one star differeth from another star in glory," but only because of more perfect reflection of Christ. So it should be in the Church below.

"Earth's poor distinctions vanish here,
To-day the young and old,
The poor and rich, one flock appear,
One Shepherd and one fold."

They climbed "to pray," reminding us that even two or three who come together to pray may claim the presence of Christ and transfiguration joys. But how human those three best men of their time are shown to be, in their falling asleep while Christ was at prayer! But upon him what an effect that prayer wrought. "As he prayed he was transfigured." Not so quickly but as surely a life of prayer always transfigures. In true prayer we behold Christ and are changed into the same image. Every true conversion is a transfiguration. Not alone the soul, but the body is changed, in fulfillment of that other command, "Glorify God in your body" (I. Cor. 6: 20). That might well be the motto of every gymnasium, of every dining-room.

Let us behold on the Holy Mount the transfigured flesh

"BEHOLD THERE TALKED WITH HIM TWO MEN WHO WERE MOSES AND ELIAS"

of the Son of man, and learn that the flesh is not itself sinful but should be shot through with the light of the indwelling Holy Spirit to make the body pure and beautiful. It was said of a wicked man who had been a Christian for a year, and whose once bloated, lecherous face had come to glow with noble purpose, "Religion has changed every cell in his body."

His garments became glistening. Christ's very garments were transfigured into likeness of the glistening white linen worn by kings in those days, to proclaim that Christ is our King. And let it suggest also that religion will affect our garb, to prevent wasteful and proud display, and especially to keep our garments within our means.

And behold there appeared Moses and Elijah. This is the clearest proof of our continued identity in the future life and heavenly recognition. In spiritual bodies came these two delegates from the court of heaven to the earthly coronation of Christ. Moses, the greatest of purely human characters, as he is proclaimed by this scene and the use of his name with Christ's in "the song of Moses and the Lamb," and Elijah, whose selection to represent the prophets, rather than eloquent and educated Isaiah, proclaims God's appreciation of heroic reformers.

Spoke of his decease. This is the sublimest, profoundest word in all the wonderful story. The theme of Moses, Elijah and Christ, at this coronation hour, was not of any honor or reward that would come to Christ, but of the death he should "accomplish at Jerusalem." The transfiguration is the coronation of self-sacrifice, parallel of that heavenly scene of throne on which was a Lamb as it had been slain. Enthroned self-sacrifice! that was the supreme glory of Christ, and it should be our supreme glory and joy. The death by which we live is found to be the grandest theme on which the King of glory and the greatest of heavenly saints can converse together, and this theme is also ours and ever shall be.

"When in scenes of glory we sing the new, new song,
'Twill be the same old story that we have loved so long."

At last the apostles awoke, the light of the face of Christ touching their eyes like the rising sun. Peter, not knowing what he said, exclaims, "Lord, it is good to be here, and us build three tents of the tree branches, one for thee, one for Moses and one for Elijah." At that Moses and Elijah whom Peter is ranking as equal to Christ, withdrew from sight, that the apostles in their worship may see no one but Jesus only—a rebuke of all saint worship, whether Catholic or Protestant. So-called "hero worship" often comes near to worship, especially in the case of the founders of great denominations. Surely we shall be most truly loyal to their memories if we worship "Jesus only," as they did when Jesus was found alone," says Luke. Ages have passed. Thousands of men, great in learning, great in statesmanship, great in heroism, have lived, but it is still true that among those who have lived in human form "Jesus is found alone," none being worthy to be placed beside him. He is "the first among the mighty, the mightiest among the pure," and surely one so incomparably above all others must have been more than man.

Hear ye him. Thus God, too, indicated the pre-eminence of Christ as the supreme authority. Whenever questions arise, let us remember that not only faith, but reason, bids us climb the mount and hear what Jesus says. Shall we think of the Old Testament? Turn to the Gospels and see how Jesus quoted them as true and authoritative. It is the highest reason to accept the word of his pure reason as of the supreme certainty of religion. It is the highest reason to accept his word as final on whatever he spoke, using our imperfect reason or on things of which the Perfect Reason has not spoken.

Bring him hither to me. The mount was a good place to go for preparation, but not a place to stay. Curiously enough, Roman Catholics have raised a monastery on the spot where they erroneously suppose the transfiguration occurred, despite the overruling of Peter's like proposal to build and stay on the mount. There is not a little of Protestant monasticism in those who are not content to live Christian joys as preparation for service, but would sit and sing themselves away to everlasting bliss, neglectful of the work which waits them in the valley below. The devil-possessed boy was to be cured with the spiritual power received on the mount of prayer. So ever the Christ's orbit should be from prayer to work and from work to prayer.

Be ye transfigured (Rom. 12: 2). The practical side of the transfiguration is that we are commanded to be transfigured. The word used in Roman or us is the same as is used in the story of Christ. "Be not conformed, but transformed." A good illustration of a human transfiguration is the case of Jerry McAuley. He came to New York City from Ireland when thirteen years of age. His father had been a counterfeiter, and for many years the boy was no better. He became a river thief, a prize-fighter—everything bad but a murderer. He was arrested for highway robbery and sent to Sing Sing prison for fifteen years. In prison he was converted, through the efforts of "Awful Gardner," a reformed convict. "Jerry" was pardoned after serving half his term, and came to New York and opened on Water street an institution called "The Helping Hand for Men." The transformation seen in his own life was the best help to the rough characters that abounded in that section of the city. Not only were hundreds of drunkards led to a like transfiguration, but the very neighborhood was changed for the better. One writer said, "I always go to Jerry's Mission when I feel a little uncertain about my theology." One could hardly doubt the power of Christ to transfigure human lives after an evening at his meeting.

Not less real are the slower transformations wrought in other lives. One evening, the Indian Chief, Teedyuscung, King of the Delawares, was sitting beside the fire in a fire wigwam. Both gazed in the flames, thinking his thoughts. At length Redwing, the friend, said: "Brother, I have been thinking of one of the best things in my new religion—a wonderful rule laid down by Jesus, and called the Golden Rule. 'Do unto others as ye would that they should do unto you.' 'That is impossible!' cried the chief. 'It can't be done.' Once more silence reigned in the wigwam. Teedyuscung was thinking. "Brother," said he, "I have thought much of what you told me, and I have discovered that there is one way which it might be done!" "And what is that way, brother?" "If the Great Spirit who made man were to give him a new heart, he could do as you say, but not else." "Brother," cried Redwing, jumping up and seizing his friend's hand, "you have found the truth! It is even as you say! And the Great God has said these words, that it may be possible for you and me to do his will—'A new heart will I give you, and a new spirit will I put within you'—so he makes it possible for us, brother." "I shall remember," said Teedyuscung, "for I have been shown the way."

$7,000 MORE FOR MACEDONIAN RELIEF

WITH this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the Macedonian relief work practically closes. A remittance of $7,000 has been sent to Rev. Mr. Peet, of the American Board, Constantinople, to be applied in part, to general relief work in the Monastir district, and also to aid the orphanage work under the charge of American missionaries in that place, which is in urgent need—the apportionment being left to the discretion of the American missionaries on the ground. Any further balances will be sent to the field through Mr. Peet. As the immediate danger, from cold and starvation, is now past in nearly all the districts where the sufferers are located, and as the refugees on the Bulgarian border (judging from the letters that have lately come to hand), seem to be in good hands, no further appeals for contributions will appear in these columns. Our Relief Committee having closed its work, is now dissolved.

Benevolent hearts in the United States, there is no joy in the spring, but only fearful forebodings of what those trembling hearts know only too well.

A recent letter from the treasurer in Macedonia reported that £1,500 had recently been reported from the London Fund, and that Miss Muriel White had sent an additional 125 francs.

The various relief workers, in their journeys among the villages could not fail to find little orphaned children, whose pitiful, uncared for condition appealed so loudly to the sympathetic hearts of our missionaries, that they felt called upon to beg for special funds with which to secure suitable premises, and gather in these little waifs for Christian care and instruction. The British Vice-Consul advised that it be entirely under American auspices, judging that it would thus meet with less opposition from the government. The call was issued for about $2,500, which would purchase available property immediately adjoining our American mission property. The children could thus attend the kindergarten and preparatory classes

A GROUP OF MACEDONIAN REFUGEES

Great Britain and Bulgaria, have acted most harmoniously and efficiently together, in all this work of Macedonina relief. Catholic missionaries and Sisters of Mercy work side by side with evangelical missionaries, colporteurs, and preachers, and all receive funds through the hands of the American missionary at Monastir. Tenderly nurtured women of rank, who knew the country and its various nationalities as few others could know them, save the missionaries, have labored most self-denyingly, and with self-abnegation, for the mitigation of the sufferings and destitution in which the struggle between Moslem rulers and Christian subjects had left the province last autumn.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's readers have generously responded to this need. The winter is now over and gone, and the spring has appeared in that part of the world. The crocuses, violets, primroses, and dandelions, have been found in sheltered nooks even on mountain sides, while on the hills and plains appear the almond trees, white with blossoms, and the fields of poppies and of winter wheat in their greenness. The latter is true in regions where the greatest terrors had not fallen, where there were still men left to plough and sow their fields last autumn, or women who might still brave the loneliness of their fields, in sections where the dreaded Albanian and Turkish guards, or the regular troops of Abdul Hamid or his irregular Bashi-Bazouks, were not terrifying and devastating the Christian population. Yet of the girls' boarding school, until the girls should be ready for the regular course, and the boys be passed on to the Orphanage and Industrial School at Salonica.

In his latest notes, Missionary Bond laments that this much needed orphanage at Monastir has not yet materialized, but he hopes to open it soon. "The Bible Lands Mission Aid Society of London, kindly sanctions our using £200, and Miss Muriel White expresses herself as glad to have the balance of her fund, about £50, go to this worthy object (he writes). With this amount in our hands, and an indefinite amount of faith in our hearts, we plan to rent a house for the present, and gather in the helpless who appeal most loudly for sympathy. We are asking the Mission to approve the desire of the Monastir station to act as the trustees of the orphanage. Larger boys would go to the industrial farm at Salonica, while we would shelter little boys and girls."

The girls' boarding-school in Monastir has taken in a dozen or fourteen homeless orphan girls, to their great delight, their comfortable and lovingly-watched-over life there seeming to them little less than paradise. Six girls are paid for by a teacher and pupils in a private school on Commonwealth avenue, Boston, each of whom took a girl for her own special care.

Rev. E. B. Haskell, writes from Monastir, that he has just visited Salonica, and was occupied for a time in overseeing relief work in Krushevo and Krutchevo and in looking up orphan children in Resna.

Run down to the summer-house, under the elm, at the foot of the garden. We want ye fer a witness."

"What, Aaron? What is it?"
"Nothin' much, only I've ketched the parson jest in the nick er time."

"Who, Aaron? What's the matter?"
"Git yer clean apron, Nancy! Who? Them two! Come, edge along!" and away he went with Nancy behind.

And there under the elm tree she had always loved, though it was not such a wedding as Mildred had dreamed of, they were married; and thence, after one more attempt to enter the presence of the inexorable aunt, they went away.

It was a happy and a sad little flight, their brief wedding journey, only a drive in the buggy that would hold two, if they sat close enough, to a neighboring town, where they passed a day with the sweet, white-haired woman, Robert's mother, whose picture hung above his bed. Mildred was not willing to go farther or to stay long, hoping against hope every hour that she might be permitted to return to the bedside of her relenting aunt. Of Mirandy, Aaron's report came daily to the little brick office building, which now became, practically, her home.

"She's kinder edgin' along," said Aaron, hopefully. "She ain't so all-fired contrary as she wuz. Some er them books and pictures er yorn, she told Nancy to put out er sight, and then when Nancy went fer 'em, she said, 'Cover 'em up, let 'em be. I don't want yer hands ter wait on me after you've been techin' them things.' And Nancy, she's got gumption. She let 'em be; only she forgot to kiver 'em over. So Aunt Mirandy, she's kinder edgin' along."

And Mildred tried to be comforted while the summer drifted away and the following winter wore into spring.

"Don't you be no ways discouraged," said Aaron; "on the outside, she's as sick as ever; but on the inside, she's awful tired o' keepin' it up. She's edgin' along; she's gittin' over the ground. She sent me post-haste off to Winchester fer that allopath doctor; but she soon sent him flyin'; his doses was too big. Then she tried the homeopath, Dr. Dow, and his doses was too finicky. Then she became a vegetarian, and not a bite er meat would she eat; and, then, over she went, like a hot flap-jack on a griddle, and told us she was goin' to be a Salisbury, that is, a person who eats only meat. So Dr. Salisbury writ and prescribed hot water and beef-steak fer breakfast, and beefsteak and bilin' water fer dinner, and more hot water the fast thing in the mornin' and the last thing at night. Wa'al, that didn't last long; and then there was the electrician who made her yell, and the clairvoyant who scared her 'enamored into fits, clutchin' and clawin' in her trances; and the Indian yarb doctor, who made the house smell's ef he was bilin' all creation."

Mildred laughed in spite of her inward distress at the dreary catalogue of efforts.

"She got disgusted with the mind cure," Aaron went on, "and said 'twas only intended fer people who had no minds of their own, and as fer the faith cure, it didn't seem to take, and one day the woman said 'twas no airtly use anintin' anybody that bore malice, and she feared Miss Mirandy wasn't quite forgivin' enough to fill the bill. Then the fat was in the fire, and Mirandy told her she'd excuse her from ministratin' any further, that if the Lord wanted to heal her, he'd heal her, ile or no ile, and she didn't pay her fare both ways from Boston and throw in her board, to hev her meddle with her family affairs. And arter that, Mirandy, she was kinder set back and more bedrid than ever. And then come the great doctor from New York, that she was put out with because he told her nothin' under the sun ailded her but hysterics, and that meant, as a general thing, a little providential affliction and a good many tempers and tantrums, and that she could walk from home to meetin' or to mill whenever she got ready."

"Brave doctor, that," said Robert.
"Poor thing," said Mildred compassionately, "I wonder if she will ever be well."
"Yes, yes, you never fear," said Robert.

"Yes, she's edgin' along, and some day the good Lord'll send somethin' to break her heart and that'll set her on her legs agin, and then she'll jest up and put with all her might for the Kingdom. My! but when she gits agoin' in the right direction, won't she git over the ground?"

They sat long and talked after Aaron had shuffled away home, and the night that settled down upon the town was clear and cool, with a high west wind, making itself felt at every crack and cranny.

Suddenly from midnight slumbers Robert awoke. A red glare in the sky, a strange, lurid, flickering shadow going and coming on the panes. Over the way, not many hundred yards from his gate, stood the old almshouse of the town. Flames had seized upon it, and were stretching their writhing coils already from window to window. He rushed into the open air, a crowd, swaying and shouting, and above them the cries of a huddled group of children rescued from the burning walls. Mildred stood at her window and watched.

Suddenly, at a casement of the burning building, a little form appeared. A great cry of anguish went up from the crowd. They had believed the children all saved. Even while she looked, the ladders were thrown up in the very whirl of the blinding smoke. Then there was a pause, and every man in all the throng seemed to hold his breath. But the child's frightened cry rang forth again, and a woman's form sprang toward the ladder. As she touched it, Robert, who had run across from his home, reached it, and brushing her aside, ran swiftly up the steps into the tossing waves of smoke. A minute more—an awful minute for Mildred—and he came down again, and laid the child in the arms of the woman waiting at the ladder's foot.

"Thank God, Robert! thank God!" she said, seizing his arm as he turned away. He started and looked at her—"Miranda, Aunt Miranda!"

"Yes, Robert, I saw the flames. I thought it was your house."

"And you came; Aaron brought you?"

"No, I walked; I ran; I got here in time to see this child at the window. See, it is one of poor Mary Driscoll's twins. Before she died, she asked me to give them a home, and I wouldn't. I let them come to this place instead."

"You will take her home now?"

"Yes, and all the rest. Send for Aaron. We shall have room enough. I want them all. Oh, Robert! oh, Mildred!" she cried, bursting into tears; "I want them all. I could take all the orphan children in the world, and not fill the hungry place left by the one I have lost."

"Not lost, Auntie," said Mildred, who losing sight of her husband, had rushed over into the crowd. "Never lost, Auntie. I am here, and I want the friend who was a mother to me, as you will be to these poor, frightened little ones. Come, Robert, I will go with you and we will soon have them safely tucked away."

"And will you stay, Mildred?"

"Yes, Auntie, dear, but can you keep us all—all the rest of the orphans and Robert and me?"

"Yes, all and always. I always wanted poor Mary's children, though I wouldn't own it, and I was afraid of giving myself care and trouble. But now I'll take them and all the rest." And in her excitement she bent and lifted a little child on either arm.

At this moment Aaron appeared upon the scene, hot and panting with haste and fright at discovering his mistress was gone. For a moment he looked at the group, and then taking up a child in his arms, he turned and headed the procession toward the old brick house.

"Let's be edgin' along," he said softly. "She's started for the Kingdom, Mirandy is, and ef we don't move on, she'll beat us all in gittin' over the ground. I alwus said 'twould come, and it has come."

The Cossacks of the Don

THE bugle rings, his steed he strides,
The battle calls him on,
And forth to meet its shock he rides—
The Cossack of the Don.
The fierce, red Tartar blood that flows
Down from unconquered sires
Makes, with the joy his wild heart knows,
When blaze war's flaming fires.

God help the foe that meets them when
The Cossacks ride to war;
The strong, swift, bearded, fighting-men
Whose friends the gray wolves are;
Who make their coverlets the snows
When they lie down to sleep,
Who faster ride than wind that blows
When they their saddles leap.

To man has seen the Cossacks' sword
Turn downward in the fight,
In vain have tides of battles poured Against them in their might;
The hoof-beats of their steeds are known,
With all their wandering clan,
From bleak Siberian highways down
To sun-kissed Astrakhan.

When sits the White Czar on his throne
Within his guarded gate,
Brooding, with brow of gloom, alone,
Upon his Empire's fate,
He knows, through every vague alarm,
While ships and men fight on,
He still may trust his strong right arm—
The Cossacks of the Don.

TRANSFORMING POWER*

How Christ Changes the Lives and Character of those who Submit to Him

WHEN men are converted, there is often a time of bewilderment. They do not quite see what the future is to be. In what way will religion be incorporated in their lives? Where is the sincerity and honesty of purpose, there is a strenuous endeavor to give up habitual sin, to strive earnestly to become good and holy. The result is often disappointing. The Christian character does not develop as was expected, and men realize with concern, that they are very different from what they used to be. The fact that the soul is "saved," even when it is fully realized, with all its eternal import, does not content a man who desires to be a real Christian. He is not at the time looking forward to heavenly rest and glory, but wants to make his present life consistent.

To such a man, weary with the struggle with sin, incapable of developing holy principles and conduct, the apostle brings a new idea of life. He would change the life within him, from the active to the passive. He points the believer to Christ, who, he says, will change the body of our humiliation, that it may be conformed to the body of his glory, and he assures us that Christ is able to subdue all things to himself. Does that mean that the believer is to do nothing? Is he to live helplessly, trusting that in some mysterious way a miracle will be worked upon him? By no means. The co-operation of the man is essential, but it is Christ who does the work. The apostle speaks of the offering of life as a willing sacrifice, a complete submission, a consecration. The man puts himself in Christ's hands to be transformed and submits himself unreservedly to the process. The indispensable condition is faith. There must be perfect confidence in Christ's power. Then there must be an earnest and sincere resolution to yield to his influence. There must be frequent prayer. Communion with Christ, as friendship with our companions, has a mighty influence. The study of Christ's life and character is also a potent means of grace. The desire to understand him, to live as he lived, to do what we think he would do if he were here—all this creates an atmosphere, an environment in which Christ can exert his transforming power. So may we be changed into his image.

Physicians often have to apply the same principles in their treatment. There opie of the Christian Endeavor Society, Epworth League and Baptist Young People's Union for April 17, Rom. 12: 1, 2; Phil. 3: 20, 21.

are patients whose very efforts to regain their health are obstacles to their recovery. The man who counts his own pulse, who minutely watches his symptoms, and is perpetually trying some new remedy, is little likely to become a healthy man. A doctor dealing with such a patient, tells him to forget himself, to go out into the fresh air, to get interested in some pursuit. "Leave your symptoms and your treatment to me. Place your case in my hands," he says, "and I will bring you through."

The educator adopts the same principle. A young man entering college, especially if previously he is largely self-educated, has his own ideas of the course he should take. His tutor asks for his confidence. He wants the young man to give up his notions, and follow the course to be marked out for him. It may be uncongenial. He may be required to devote himself to mathematics instead of the classics; but if he has confidence in his tutor, he understands that the tutor sees that he needs just that discipline for the development of his mind. He submits and finds the benefit of the course.

The story is told of a young man who became dissipated, and abandoned himself to low and coarse forms of vice. But he had some good points in his character, and one of these was a veneration for an uncle who was a singularly wise and pure character. Learning of the young man's fall, the uncle went to him, and told him he was going to take a tour through Europe and would be glad of his companionship. The young man gladly consented. For several months they were in daily association. The young man was not lectured or scolded, but in their talks his thoughts were led to high ideals. He was introduced to good people, and in some European capitals he was shown how vice degrades and corrupts the character. All was very pleasant and enjoyable, and at the end of the tour, without any direct teaching but by simple association with the good and pure, he returned a transformed being.

Got $25,000 Through Prayer

MISS FRANCES BENNETT, of Lowell, Mass., is a young woman who has for several years been very active in Christian work. She has taken a personal interest in the progress of the Lowell Young Women's Christian Association, of which she is general secretary, and which has been doing an excellent work among the factory girls of that city. It has been Miss Bennett's hope to find the means to erect a building devoted to social and spiritual work among this class. In answer to prayer, a room for the gatherings of these girls had already been provided. Later, another room was added, and this was also secured after an earnest supplication to the Heavenly Father. Thus step by step the work progressed. More rooms were added and the movement began to assume a permanent form. Money, which came from various sources, was now carefully saved for the new building, but the realization still seemed a long way off.

Quite lately Miss Bennett was impressed with the conviction that a crisis in the work was near, and that still more earnest and believing prayer would meet with a response. She now prayed with an intense earnestness, and was joined in her petitions by others who were closely identified with the work among the mill girls. One day lately, while she was visiting friends in Long Island, N. Y., a telegram was handed to her by a messenger. She trembled as she opened it, fearing that it might contain bad news concerning her mother, who lay very ill at home. When she at last tore off the envelope and read the message, her eyes filled with tears of joy and a great happiness sprang up in her heart.

"My prayers are answered," she cried aloud, turning to the friends at her side. "I knew it would be so and I thank the Lord for it. Now, they can go on with the building. This telegram has brought me $25,000 and our mill girls at Lowell will have a home now."

Miss Bennett was born in New York City and educated in Boston. After the death of her father, S. Masterson Bennett, she became bookkeeper and cashier in a large grocery store and worked her way through college. At a mission service many years ago, there came to her the sense of the need of mercy, forgiveness and consecration; and she found peace and inspiration in devoting her life to the spiritual and social uplifting of young people and to comforting the lowly and the lonely.

A Russian Church on Wheels

THE CONGREGATION GATHERING FOR SERVICE IN THE CHAPEL CAR

At this time, when Russia is transporting her vast armies across Siberia, it is interesting to note that, even amid all the haste and confusion incident to war, the spiritual welfare of the men is not wholly overlooked. Europeans and Americans who have traveled, not hurriedly, as most tourists do, but leisurely on the Siberian Railway, have observed the elegant traveling church cars in use on that road. There are only three of these chapel cars in use thus far. They are usually to be found side-tracked at some isolated portion of the 5,000-mile trans-Asiatic line. It was intended that they should be used to enable service to be performed at churchless settlements along the line.

The church-car illustrated in the photograph is one of the finest in existence. It cost 30,000 rubles, or about $18,000. It was built at the Russian car-works near St. Petersburg, and the material throughout is Russian. The interior is in keeping with a religious edifice, without being gaudy or too lavish. A few beautiful panels, showing religious subjects, are the only attempts at artistic decoration.

In addition to the simple church furniture, the church car contains secretarial accommodation for the "chibachik," or priest, and his aide; also, partitioned off, a small sleeping apartment for the two, with let-down berths and lavatory. At another end of the car is a makeshift kitchen. The man-of-all-work who looks after this church on wheels sleeps on a narrow bench (which by day serves as a kitchen table), or on the carpeted floor. The illumination is entirely by candles. The car is well heated by a wood stove; but the most important thing is that it is built almost "cold-proof," with double windows, double framing (with air-space between), lined throughout with jute sheathing and camel's-wool felting. A couple of bells under one of the eaves announce to worshipers the hour of service.

L. LODIAN.

The Cruse

Is thy cruse of comfort wasting? Rise and share it with another;
And, through all the year of famine, it shall serve thee and thy brother;
Love divine will fill thy storehouse, or thy hand will fill thy brother's;
Scanty fare for one will often make a royal feast for two.

For the heart grows rich in giving; all its wealth is living grain;
Seeds which mildewed in the garner, scattered, fill with gold the plain.

Is thy burden hard and heavy? Do thy steps drag wearily?

Help to bear thy brother's burden; God will bear it, then, and thee.

Numb and weary on the mountains, wouldst thou sleep amidst the snow?

Chafe the frozen form beside thee, and together both shall glow.

Art thou stricken in life's battle? Many wounded round thee moan;

Lavish on their wounds thy balsam, and that balm shall heal thine own.

Is the heart a well left empty? None but God its void can fill;

Nothing but a ceaseless fountain can its ceaseless longing still.

Is the heart a living power? Self-sustained, its strength sinks low;

It can only live in loving, and, by serving, love will grow.

Unsinkable Submarines

A SCIENTIFIC Frenchman, M. Desmoucaux de Givray, has been demonstrating that he can put on the water a craft that cannot be sunk either by treacherous waves or other agencies. In the enormous round fountain of the Tuileries gardens, he gave an exhibition of this unsinkable canoe, in miniature form, of course, which was attended by some score of engineers and sportsmen. The canoe, twenty-four inches long, eight wide and six and a half deep, proved entirely impervious to water and impossible to upset. It is impervious to water, because a solid composition of cork joins together the various parts; and it cannot be submerged, because, even with a heavy freight, it is much lighter than water. Moreover, it cannot be overturned but for a moment, since the keel is heavier than the shell, and thus permits the boat to right itself at once. The invention is simple and the idea itself not new; but M. de Givray is the first to have realized in practical form the craft itself. It behaved in all ways as he intended, and he has a far larger vessel of the same build which has been put through the same ordeal. The discovery can be applied, says the inventor, to any and all craft; properly constructed, even an ironclad may be demolished, but cannot sink. It is interesting to add that M. de Givray was led to this discovery through having lost his father, his grandfather, and sixteen others among his relatives, by the sinking of ordinary merchant vessels.

Submarine boat maneuvers have been proceeding off the Isle of Wight, recently, and a few days ago one of the boats, the A 1, showing certain defects in submerging and rising, was being retested. She was lying in seven fathoms of water awaiting an incoming battleship with a view of torpedoing her. As she lay there with only the periscope above water, a steamer, the Berwick Castle, approached. Apparently the periscope did not give a view of the steamer, which was on top of the submarine boat before the liner's crew saw her, but when the collision occurred, they supposed that they had struck a derelict torpedo, and the steamer was not stopped. Hours passed, and the submarine boat did not return, and a search was made for her. She was found at the bottom in diving trim. Everything was found battened down and no breach was made in the hull. It is supposed that the boat was overturned by the Berwick Castle, and that this upset her gasoline tanks, the fumes from which suffocated the crew, for whom a search was made, but at latest accounts no trace of them had been found.

A Wave Motor

At Santa Catalina, Calif., is a successful wave motor. At a point unprotected by outlying rocks or shoals, two wells, eight and five feet in diameter, respectively, are sunk in the cliff, one behind the other, the foremost but five feet from the brink. These wells extend from thirty feet above high tide to below the ebb and open at bottom in the ocean. A counterbalanced float rises and falls between vertical guides in the foremost well, as the swells outside raise or lower the water level. The plunger of a common force pump working in any part of a long pump barrel occupies the second well, forcing on the down stroke the salt water vertically 125 feet to a 5,000-gallon tank, raised on a sixty-foot derrick on the bank above, from whence it runs to tanks along the country roads for miles around, and is used for sprinkling purposes. In ordinary weather, the pump fills the supply tank in about one hour. The surplus will also shortly be utilized in the manufacture of salt.

Cocoa Tea Cakes

CORN STARCH TALK

By MRS. HELEN ARMSTRONG.

A child's craving for sweets is a very natural one, and should be gratified, in a rational manner. When a child is allowed free access to the cake box or doughnut jar he is often tempted to eat when he would be much better off without food, so it is well to restrict the use of sweets to a legitimate place, as a dessert to the regular meal. Much more is not a suitable diet for children, and starch and fats are very needful.

The fat of cream and good butter is easily assimilated and more digestible than the fat of meats. To furnish starch we have many food products to choose from, and sugar in various forms plays an important part. For the starch we have nothing to compare with Kingsford's Oswego Corn Starch, and it may be used in some dishes without monotony. It is capable of infinite variety in preparation, and is both inexpensive and easy to use.

A simple cake that will please almost any child is one in which cocoa is used. Kingsford's Oswego Corn Starch for a part. The receipt given makes a simple and attractive cake which will give you one pang of regret for the eating.

COCOA TEA CAKES.

Beat singly three large eggs into a scant cup of sugar creamed with a third of a cup of butter. When smooth and light add half a cup of milk and half a cup each of flour and Kingsford's Oswego Corn Starch sifted with the level teaspoons of baking powder and one-fourth cup of cocoa. Beat well, add a little salt and half a teaspoon of vanilla. Place in muffin pans, sprinkle with chopped nuts and bake in moderate oven.

The ART of BREATHING*

THE art of breathing correctly is less understood than any one of the various functions of life. It is natural to breathe, of course, but very few persons perform the function of respiration naturally. Many persons do not know how the diaphragm works during the act of respiration. In correct respiration the diaphragm descends during inhalation, and all the muscles connected with the side ribs expand. When the breath is exhaled the diaphragm ascends. Respiration should be slow and deep, causing large quantities of air to come in contact with the membranes that absorb oxygen from the air inhaled. Many women never take a full breath after adult life is reached, and the average man, who has given up vigorous exercise, rarely fills his lungs to their full capacity. In fact, many persons are so unaccustomed to forcible breathing that an attempt is followed by exhaustion, dizziness and palpitation of the heart.

After the fullest possible inspiration, the lungs should contain about 330 cubic inches of air. After the fullest possible expiration, the lungs still contain about 200 cubic inches of air. So it is possible, by strong effort, to inhale and exhale about 230 cubic inches of air. But the great majority of people rarely inhale more than thirty cubic inches of air in quiet breathing. There are very few people of normal lung capacity. Several times a day the inflation of the chest by a series of gentle, deep, prolonged inspirations and forced expirations, when the practice does not provoke coughing, is very important. Whether walking on a level or climbing, the patient should breathe deeply and slowly. In ordinary breathing, the chief movement should be at the waist. The chest should expand at the belt and sides. The expansion of the upper part of the chest is necessary only in very full breathing.

To take a deep, full breath, expand, first the chest, breathing in until the entire waist swells out, the sides expand, and the anterior wall expands; then breathe in a little more until the whole abdomen expands; now try to inhale still a little more by lifting up the chest and drawing in slightly the lower part of the abdominal wall. This gives a full and complete respiration. Paroxysms of coughing produced by full breathing and by distention of unused lung-tissue should not be regarded as a contra-indication.

Deep, full breathing exercises the muscles around the waist, strengthens them and gives one an added power of endurance. Breathing is really a kind of internal gymnastic exercise for the vital organs. The contents of the abdomen are moved and their energy increased; therefore, if one breathes only claviculary, or upper chest breathing, he does not exercise what is below the lungs, and it is now universally conceded that to enjoy perfect health, the breathing must expand the entire trunk.

THE MYSTERY

BY MARY SARGENT HOPKINS

UNDER the snow, so white and cold,
The dead leaves lie,
Close pressed
Unto the breast
Of Earth; and high
The frozen clouds enfold
A mystery.

When Nature wills, the sun of Spring
Will bid the leaves
Arise!
In sweet surprise
Earth bares her breast,
And warm veins bring
Sweet ministering.

Tender and sweet, but still not quite
The same dear leaves
I missed,
And fondly kissed,
Ere Death had said:
"They're mine!" despite
My questioning.

From out the grave of Hope now dead
New life will spring;
The same,
Yet not the same.
And peace long gone
With joys that fled
Will come again.

An American Girl's Daring

IN his new book, "My Air-Ships," published by The Century Company, Santos Dumont, the famous balloonist, relates some most interesting experiences. One of these is as follows:

"A young lady, well known in New York society, having visited my station with her friends on several occasions, confessed an extraordinary desire to navigate the air-ship.

"You mean that you would have the courage to be taken up in the free balloon, with no one holding its guide-rope?" I asked. 'Mademoiselle, I thank you for the confidence.'

"Oh, no," she said, 'I do not want to be taken up. I want to go up alone and navigate it free, as you do.'

"I think that the simple fact that I consented on condition that she would take a few lessons in the handling of the motor and machinery speaks eloquently in favor of my own confidence in the 'No. 9.' She had three such lessons; and then, on a date that will be memorable in the fasti of dirigible ballooning, rising from my station grounds in the smallest of possible dirigibles, she cried, 'Let go, all.'

"From my station at Neuilly Saint James she guide-roped to Bagatelle. The guide-rope, trailing some thirty feet, gave her an altitude and equilibrium that never varied. I will not say that no one ran along beside the dragging guide-rope; but, certainly, no one touched it until the termination of the cruise at Bagatelle, when the moment had arrived to pull down the intrepid girl-navigator."

Concerning the navigation and speed of balloons, M. Dumont says: "It is not like sail navigation; and all talk about 'tacking' is meaningless. If there is any wind at all, it is in a given direction, so that the analogy with a river current is complete. When there is no wind at all, we may liken it to the navigation of a smooth lake or pond.

"Suppose that my motor and propeller push me through the air at the rate of twenty miles an hour. I am in the position of a steamboat captain whose propeller is driving him up or down the river at the rate of twenty miles an hour. Imagine the current to be ten miles an hour. If he navigates against the current, he accomplishes ten miles an hour with respect to the shore, though he has been traveling at the rate of twenty miles an hour through the water. If he goes with the current, he accomplishes thirty miles an hour with respect to the shore, though he has not been going any faster through the water. This is one of the reasons why it is so difficult to estimate the speed of an air-ship."

Kind-hearted Policemen

HERE is a pleasant little story anent the kind-heartedness of the New York policeman. Not long ago an old man, a Civil War veteran, walked into one of the downtown stations, and, walking up to the Sergeant's desk, said:

"My name is McDonald. I am a veteran of the Civil War. I have sent my pension voucher to Washington, and I have just got word that it has not arrived. I am afraid that it has gone astray. We live near here, my wife and I; we are old, and we have not had much to eat for two or three days, while waiting for the pension money."

The sergeant called the reserve platoon on the floor. "Men," said he, "here is an old soldier who is in need. Now, I am going to do my share, and I think you fellows will help, too."

The sergeant put a dollar on the desk, then the reserves searched themselves, and as a result nine dollars were handed over to the old man. "Now, Eliza and I will have a good dinner," said he; "we've been husband and wife for many years. When I was shot during the Battle of the Wilderness, Eliza was one of those volunteer nurses, and she took care of me. After the war we got married."

The old soldier and Eliza were soon enjoying a good, hearty meal in their little room over a grocery store. They were happy, and so were the broad-shouldered men in blue who had made their happiness possible.

Proposed Missionary Rest-House

FROM far-off China, Mr. John Fowler, United States Consul at Chefoo, brings news of the inauguration of a project, which will gladden the hearts of many missionaries and their families. Mr. Fowler, who has just returned to this country for a brief period of rest and recuperation, after labors unusually exhausting and brilliantly successful, called recently at the office of this journal, and after congratulating the proprietor on the beneficent work the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD had enabled him to do for the starving people of China, in which Mr. Fowler did valuable service, he explained the new project.

Consul Fowler fully endorsed the statement made by the missionaries, that the climate and conditions of life in that land are peculiarly trying to the American constitution. After a few years the energies flag, it becomes almost impossible to work or sleep, and the missionary must pay the heavy expenses of a journey home, or when, by strong will power, he forces himself to remain at his post, he renders himself liable to a permanent break-down. It has, however, been found that there is in Shantung Province an ideal resort, where there is pure air, sea-breezes and revivifying conditions. The China Inland Mission had the merit of discovering the advantages of this locality, which is named Chefoo. The Mission erected a sanatorium there, to which it sent its workers on their showing symptoms of an approaching break-down. They discovered that a few weeks spent there, in the invigorating air, had as beneficial an effect as a long sea voyage, and the tired worker was toned up and was soon able to resume his work with his accustomed energy. As the China Inland Mission has seven hundred and fifty missionaries in that field, the little institution was always full, and though few stayed long under its roof, there was seldom a vacant room. The benefits it conferred, however, were so clearly proved, that it has been decided to erect another institution there for the benefit of missionaries of other societies.

There are in China about 3,000 Protestant missionaries, including Baptists, Methodists, Presbyterians, Congregationalists, and workers of the Dutch Reformed and other churches. Among these there are many to whom the opportunity of a few weeks in bracing air would be an invaluable boon. If a sanatorium were built and equipped, a very moderate charge, within the narrow missionary means, would render it self-supporting. This fact was so obvious, that an effort was made to raise the funds for the initial expense. Very soon, sufficient money was received to purchase an eligible site, and plans were drawn for a building to cost $12,000. As Consul Fowler was returning to America for a visit, it was suggested to him that he bring the situation before the American public, with the view of ascertaining whether the Christian people here who have the welfare of the missionaries at heart, would not come to their help in this beneficent scheme. With the kindness and courtesy for which Mr. Fowler is renowned, he undertook the task, which we believe will commend itself to the churches. Dr. Louis Klopsch, the proprietor of this journal, was so impressed with the importance of the project that he immediately gave a thousand dollars to the fund, and promised to have the matter placed before the readers of this journal and to receive any contributions they might make toward the building.

Chefoo is one of the few Chinese ports accessible by steamer. It is on the coast, with facilities for sea-bathing, and on the south there is a fine open country, with access to the mountains. Missionaries from any part of China or Corea could reach it easily, and there is no doubt that once established, a sanatorium there would save many a precious life. It is intended to make the institution entirely undenominational, and to put it under the charge of a board in which the various missionary societies are represented. The chairman of the preliminary committee is Dr. Hunter Corbett, of the Presbyterian Mission, and the Rev. John A. Stooke, of the China Inland Mission, has accepted the office of secretary.

Deafness Overcome

A Device That Is Scientific, Simple, Direct, and Instantly Restores Hearing in Even the Oldest Person—Comfortable, Invisible and Perfect Fitting.

16 Page Book Containing a History of the Discovery and Many Hundred Signed Testimonials from All Parts of the World—SENT FREE.

The True Story of The Invention of Wilson's Common Sense Ear Drums Told by George H. Wilson, the Inventor.

As deaf from infancy. Eminent doctors, surgeons and specialists treated me at great expense and yet did me no good. I tried all the artificial appliances then claimed to restore hearing, but they failed to benefit me in the least. I even went to the best specialists in the world, but their efforts were unavailing. My case was pronounced incurable!

I grew desperate; my deafness tormented me. Daily I was becoming more of a recluse, avoiding the companionship of people because of the annoyance my deafness and sensitiveness caused me. Finally I began to experiment on myself, and after patient years of study, labor and personal expense, I perfected something that I found took the place of the natural ear drum, and I called it Wilson's Common Sense Ear Drum, which I now wear day and night with perfect comfort, and do not even have to remove them when sleeping. No one can tell I am wearing them, as they do not show, and as they give no discomfort whatever, I scarcely know it myself.

With these drums I can now hear a whisper. I join in general conversation and hear everything coming around me. I can hear a sermon or lecture from any part of a large church or hall. My general health is improved because of the great change my Ear Drums have made in my life. My spirits are bright and cheerful. I am relieved, changed man.

My fortunate discovery it is no longer necessary for any deaf person to carry a trumpet, a tube, or any such old-fashioned makeshift. My Common Sense Ear Drum is built on the strictest scientific principles, contains no metal, wires, or strings of any kind, and is entirely new and up to date in all respects. It is so small that no one can see it when in position, yet it collects all the sound waves and focuses them against the drum head, causing you to hear naturally and perfectly. It will do this even when the natural ear drums are partially or entirely destroyed, perforated, scarred, relaxed, or thickened. Let any ear from childhood to old age, male or female, and aside from the fact that it does not show, never causes the least irritation, and can be used with comfort day and night without removal for any one.

With my device I can overcome deafness in any form, no matter how acquired, whether from catarrh, cold fever, typhoid or brain fever, measles, whooping cough, gatherings in the ear, shocks from artillery, through accidents. My invention not only overcomes deafness, but at once stops the progress of deafness and a roaring and buzzing noises. The greatest annual cures in the world recommend it, as well as physicians of all schools. It will do for you what no medical or medical skill on earth can do.

I want to place my 16-page book on deafness in the hands of every deaf person in the world. I will gladly send it free to anyone whose name and address I can get. It describes and illustrates Wilson's Common Sense Ear Drums and contains bona fide letters from numerous users in the United States, Canada, Mexico, Ireland, Scotland, Ireland, Wales, Australia, New Zealand, Tasmania, India, and the remotest islands. I have letters from people at every station of life—ministers, physicians, lawyers, merchants, society ladies, etc.—and tell the truth about the benefits to be derived from my wonderful little device. You will find the names of people in your own town and state, and whose names you know, and I am sure that all will convince you that the remedy for deafness has at last been solved by my invention.

Don't delay; write for the free book to-day and receive my firm—The Wilson Ear Drum Co., 1671 Todd Building, Louisville, Ky., U. S. A.

VISIBLE GLORY

Christ Transfigured on the Mount

BY MRS. M. BAXTER.

WHEN the Star of Bethlehem was lost to human sight, what became of it? The last which the Magi saw of it was when "it stood over where the young child was" (Matt. 2:9). Was not the glory of the Lord, which shone around the shepherds of Bethlehem (Luke 2:9), the same glory of the Lord which was in the star? What, then, became of it? Did it not enter into that little Babe, veiled indeed, for the veil was his flesh (Heb. 10:20), but shining out on the mount of transfiguration?

Peter had confessed Jesus as "the Christ, the Son of the living God," and the Lord had said "Verily, I say unto you, that there be some of them that stand here, which shall not taste of death till they have seen the kingdom of God come with power. And after six days, Jesus taketh with him Peter, and James, and John, and leadeth them up into a high mountain apart, and was transfigured before them. And his raiment became shining, exceeding white as snow, so as no fuller on earth can white them." "His face did shine as the sun, and his raiment was white as the light" (Matt. 17:2). Was not this the glory of the Lord, his manifest presence which went up from the temple (Ezek. 11:23), because of the sins of his people, and which appeared only in the life, the words and works of the Lord Jesus, but which on this occasion was permitted to shine through the veil of his flesh in a glory which human eyes might see?

The disciples' expectation was set upon an earthly kingdom, with earthly glory; now they had a glimpse of the kingdom of God come with power, a far mightier power than that of armies, a far greater glory than of wealth and learning: for here were two men who had lived on earth among men, whose faults have not been hidden from us, but who had been fully at the disposal of their God. One had died, the other had been taken away without dying. They have now the opportunity to talk with Jesus; and their subject is not the great things which they have done, nor even the great things which Jesus has done. They, at least, had understood that all this did not suffice to save a lost world. It was just that which Peter had been unwilling to hear of: the coming sufferings of his Lord, which was the only theme of his heavenly converse on this unique occasion. "They spake of his decease [exodus], which he should accomplish at Jerusalem." Each of these men, when on earth, had spent forty days and nights alone with God; they had had an opportunity to know him. Nothing personal touched them; they knew that it was in his heart to redeem a lost world; and nothing else occupied these men whose hearts were one with him.

This was the heavenly pattern of the coming kingdom. The lowly Jesus glorified, the sleeping saints raised and transfigured, the living saints transfigured with them and with the Lord, his interests absorbing them, and living men upon the earth permitted to see and hear the words of these heavenly ones; such will be the order of things in the Millennium! And meanwhile, at the foot of the mountain, were his disciples who had been left behind, humbled and disappointed, for they were experiencing that the power which the Lord had given them to cast out devils was no more with them. In their hearts the uppermost thing was, which of them should be the greatest, and they did not understand the importance of that announcement of the Lord Jesus before he went up into the mountain: "The Son of man must suffer many things, and be rejected of the elders, and of the chief priests, and scribes, and be killed, and after three days rise again."

"And Peter answered and said to Jesus, Master, it is good for us to be here; and let us make three tabernacles: one for thee, and one for Moses, and one for Elias. For he wist not what to say; for they were sore afraid" (Mark 9:5-6). Luke says, "Not knowing what he said." Peter was like many disciples nowadays—more ready to say something, right or wrong, than to keep silence.

Crooked Spines Made Straight

If you are suffering from any form of spinal trouble, you can be relieved in your own home without pain or discomfort. A wonderful anatomical appliance has been invented by a man whose spine was curved for thirty years. By the use of this invention his spine was straightened. It is nature's own method. It has never yet failed. The old methods of torture are doomed forever. The scientific and medical world is amazed at the marvelous results. Physicians in hospitals and in private practice are endorsing it. The new discovery relieves the pressure at the affected parts of the spine, the spinal cord is invigorated and strengthened, the cartilage between the vertebrae expands and the spine is straightened.

There is bright hope for all, no matter how long you have suffered. We have strong testimonials from every state in the Union. The appliances are being sent all over the world. Each one is made from individual measurements and fits perfectly. There is positively no inconvenience in wearing.

We guarantee satisfaction or refund your money at the end of thirty days' trial.

Questions & Answers

SPECIAL NOTICE

All letters for the "Mail-Bag" must contain the name and address of the writer, not for publication, but so that an answer may be sent by mail if necessary.

E. D., Bloomfield, N. Y. Would it be possible for me to enter a Training School for Nurses, as I have only a public school education, or is it necessary to have a high school certificate?

Write to Superintendent Training School for Nurses, St. Luke's Hospital, Presbyterian Hospital, Post Graduate Hospital, and Bellevue Hospital, New York, or to Johns Hopkins Hospital, Baltimore, Md. The hospitals have different standards and requirements for nurses.

F. W. McC., Nebraska. 1. Is a witness in Court compelled to testify under oath, even though he believes that such a thing is wrong? 2. Can a person be a Christian and believe in the teachings of Theosophy?

1. Yes. If a Quaker, he may affirm. 2. The two systems of doctrine cannot be reconciled.

J. W. McC., Kelso, Tenn. What should one do to acquit himself with honor and not violate the law, when attacked with vile epithets or force?

Such abuse is best answered by silence. If the assailant proceeds to violence or slander, there is a remedy in the courts; but, even in such a case, silence is preferable. He can be sued civilly or criminally, or he can be bound over to keep the peace. The slanderer does himself a permanent injustice, and far greater injury than he can inflict upon you.

P. S., Rockland, Mass. A minister who preached here recently said that a large part of the Old Testament was not the word of God. Is that true?

God has revealed himself progressively to the world (see Heb. 1:1-3) as it was able to comprehend it. Much of the legislation of Leviticus, Numbers, etc., has become obsolete, the types having reached their fulfillment in Christ. He did not hesitate to reverse the laws laid down in certain parts of the Old Testament (see Matt. 5:21, 27, etc.) The Old Testament was the Word of God to the people who had that, and that only, but we are bound to read it in the clearer light of Christ's teaching. No one, for example, would think of offering animals in sacrifice now. Yet in the Psalms and the Prophets there are passages clearly and unmistakably bearing the marks of Divine origin, which for beauty and truth can never be surpassed.

F. F. I., Johnson, Wash. Do we not receive the gift of the Holy Spirit at baptism?

Not necessarily. The Holy Spirit may enter into a man's soul then or at some other time. If by baptism the Holy Spirit could be obtained, preaching would be superfluous, and all that would be required would be to induce men to be baptized. Spiritual grace can never be obtained by an external rite.

H. L. H., South China, Me. We have the promise that when two or three agree touching anything they shall ask, it shall be done, yet in this town earnest prayer was offered for the conversion of sinners in a series of meetings we have been holding, and it has not been answered. Why was it?

God never forces conversion. He leaves men free to accept or reject the offer of salvation. If you ask him to do that which it is his principle not to do, your prayer would fail, but you were quite right in offering the prayer. It showed your desire, which was his desire, too. He longs to have men turn to him, but they must do so voluntarily. Perhaps more good was done than you know. The fruits of such services do not always appear at once. Do not hastily conclude that your prayers were unanswered, because of their not being answered immediately.

E. S. W., Houston, Tex. Some time since, THE MAIL-BAG stated "that it is both morally and legally wrong to charge usurious rates of interest." Now I desire to ask if it would be morally right for a person who had contracted a loan at usurious rate of interest, though it was done without his knowledge, to enforce the law against the parties from whom the loan was obtained, though it would inure to his benefit to do so? In a case of usury that was tried in all the Courts in our State, all the interest that had accrued for a term of years on a loan was cut out by the Court, thus, while enforcing the law as to usury, the borrower was benefiting himself.

We cannot express an opinion on any particular case, in the absence of a knowledge of all the facts. On general principles, however, it may be stated that a borrower who, without knowing it, is overreached in the matter of interest, is morally and legally entitled to redress; whereas a borrower who submits to usury voluntarily, intending afterward to escape all liability through legal process, does not deserve any redress whatsoever. Although the courts may grant him redress, he is morally as culpable as the usurer.

C. Harris, M.D., Muscogee, I. T. I sent $10 of the Lord's money to the American Tract Society for five-cent Testaments, and in suitable boxes placed them in every cell in the United States jail in this city. Had I means, I would place "His Word" in every cell, in every prison in the land.

Here is a capital suggestion and a good example for Christian workers in other places to follow,

H. B. S., Obispo Valley, N. Y. Was the statement of Christ (Matt. 24:34) fulfilled, that that generation should not pass away till all was fulfilled?

We have repeatedly explained, that the word "generation" is, in other parts of the certain wicked persons darted harmful rays upon the first object they looked at in the day. Their first morning glance was believed to be fatal to man or beast. 2. This is generally an inherited defect, that may be cured by a skilful oculist.

J. S. L., Stockton, Ill. 1. Can you give the authority upon which the claim is made that Noah was 120 years in building the ark? 2. How long was he in the ark? 3. When God said, "I do set my bow in the cloud, and it shall be for a token of a covenant between me and the earth," does it signify that this was the first appearance of the rainbow?

1. Genesis 6:3 is interpreted as meaning that 120 years' time from that warning would be granted to the people for repentance, and that this period, or a considerable portion of it, was devoted by Noah to warning the people and building the ark. 2. Noah was 600 years old when the ark was built (Genesis 7:7). One week later, on the seventeenth day of the second (Jewish) month, rain began, and lasted forty days. On the seventeenth day of the seventh month, or 150 days after the deluge began, the ark rested on ite; New Jersey, Blue State; New York, Empire; North Carolina, Turpentine; Ohio, Buckeye; Pennsylvania, Keystone; Rhode Island, Plantation; South Carolina, Palmetto; Tennessee, Lion's Den; Texas, Lone Star; Vermont, Green Mountain; Virginia, Dominion; Wisconsin, Badger. 2. Mount Logan, in Alaska, is 19,500 feet high.

R. T. Trevor, Wis. We have a saloon here although the law forbids it to be open on Sunday, its doors are generally open. What shall we do?

If the law forbids Sunday opening and can prove a violation by witnesses, who personally see liquor sold, you can compel enforcement of the law. Write to Rev. Harvey Wood, Secretary American Temperance Union, 3 East 14th St., N. Y., for advice as to best measures to adopt in such a case.

W. R. D., Memphis, Tenn. 1. What is the population of Corea? 2. What makes it of so much consequence in the present war? 3. What is the extent of Corea's trade?

1. About 15,000,000. 2. Its geographical position. If Russia should succeed in acquiring any considerable part of Corea territory, it would then have seaboard outlets on the Sea of Japan and Yellow Sea. 3. Corea has treaty ports open to trade. Her imports average over $8,000,000 a year, exports $4,000,000—both having quadrupled within twenty years. The country produces rice, barley, wheat, sorghum, millet, beans, ginseng, hides, and imports cotton, silk, kerosene, railway materials, clothing, provisions, matches, sugar, and various kinds of machinery.

Mrs. S. M. S., Tilton, N. H. I have seen numerous allusions of the friendship of Russia to the United States. I would like to know if service Russia ever rendered the United States, when and under what circumstances?

During our Civil War, and when there were apprehensions of European interference, Russia voluntarily kept a fleet of warships in Western waters ready to actively espouse the Union cause. This is a historical fact.

Reader, Boston, Mass. No. We have continued all appeals for Macedonian relief, our letters from missionaries plainly indicating that the acute need is over. No more contributions are desired.

Reader, Chicago. It is not necessary to characterize the conduct of a daughter who is so unfeeling as to forget her recent bereavement, and to plunge into amusement immediately after her mother's death. C. playing proclivities and reckless Sunday recreation would indicate that there must have been some defect in early training.

Miscellaneous

Mrs. Z. A. B., Lowell, Mass. We have not a hymn complete.

R. M. N., Smithsburg, Md. No. The word "Genevieve" is not in the Bible.

D. B., Wellsburg, W. Va. We presume they were destroyed in the Tabernacle fire.

Florence G. M., Barnum, Minn. "Ragtime" music in which syncopation is the chief feature, is so much overdone that it has come to be held in light esteem by the best musical authorities.

Mrs. Captain M., St. Martins, N. B. 1. No doubtless, after some early settler in the vicinity. 2. They are not reconciled. 3. Crown Prince Louise, so far as we know, has not returned to her husband, whom she left. Her companion was her children's tutor.

Mrs. B. S. E. Premonitions may be classified among those mysterious psychical and spiritual experiences that cannot be analyzed or explained. They are outside the domain of logical law, the fact of their existence cannot be controverted. It is possible that as one who is spiritually-minded grows old, the veil between the two worlds becomes thinner, and experiences may occur which the ordinary mind cannot grasp or understand.

Emmeline O'D., Jersey City, N. J. 1. Rev. L. Ewing, of Cumberland Presbyterian Church, I. E. Mo., has been and still is one of the most active and earnest leaders in the anti-dancing cause. Write to him for all information as to present status of the movement. 2. No; we believe a man would not seek to choose a wife from a ball-room acquaintance. 3. The Mormons, who are said to be notoriously immoral, encourage dancing and allow drinking by both sexes at the dances.

W. H. H. S., Wrightsville, Ga. The clipping you sent is one of many similar ones we have seen, which deal with alleged sacred relics. The able scholars believe these stones to be mere monetary fabrications, very ingenious, but unfounded, designed for consumption by the credulous, ignorant and superstitious. As an illustration of absurd stories of this sort, we have heard it stated that in various Roman churches abroad, there are enough alleged pieces of the "true" Cross to make together at least half a dozen crosses.

Our Weekly Puzzle Competition

Conducted by A. B. R. Open to all Readers of "The Christian Herald"

All Solutions must be sent in on postal cards, and no other business should be mentioned

1. Mail your answer on the Monday following the date of this paper.
2. No communication post-marked before or after this particular Monday will be recognized, hence, in the consideration of solutions and the awarding of prizes, distance plays no part whatever.
3. 250 prizes will be awarded to the first 250 correct answers.
4. In fairness to all, no communications will be examined until ten days after the date of mailing mentioned above.
5. Of course, under these circumstances, only subscribers within the boundaries of the United States proper, and the Dominion of Canada can successfully compete.

6. The names of all who have correctly solved any of the puzzles will be published in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, whether they receive a prize or not.

7. The prize for this week's puzzle will be a copy of The Golden Treasury for the Children of God, sent all charges prepaid.

8. Address all postal cards in this competition:

PUZZLE No. III

OVER the entrance to a cave, on the desolate shore of an island, these words were written in large letters: "Hope thou in God, for my expectation is from him." The dead body of a missionary was found near the cave, which had been his shelter. His journal, which was also found, relates that his six companions had died of starvation, and that he, without food for several days, must soon die in the same way. The mission, for which he had given his life, was committed to the care of the Christian Church.

The sad fate of this devoted man kindled the zeal of many, and a mission ship, called by his name, was built as a memorial.

Who was the missionary, and where did he die?

New Testament, translated "nation." The Jewish nation, to whom the words referred, has not passed away.

W. H., Woolcot, N. Y. In what sense was John the Baptist more than a prophet, as is stated in Luke 7:26?

He was unique in being a herald of Christ. It was a commission far above that of any of the prophets and raised him to a higher standard. Christ described him as the greatest of all. He prepared the way by his preaching of repentance for the proclamation of salvation which Christ made.

G. S. P., Woodstock, Ont., Can. How did the song "Dolly Gray" become popular? What is it founded upon?

The song became popular through being sung at various places of amusement, where the catchy air and the simple sentiment were appreciated. It is supposed to be the farewell of a young soldier to his sweetheart, as he starts for the war.

W. R. B., South Bound Brook, N. J. The chronology found on the margin of the Bible is not a portion of the Bible text, by any means. It is the chronology compiled by Archbishop Ussher, a distinguished Irish prelate, who was born in 1580. His figures are always used in the Authorized Version.

C. E. H., Winsted, Ct. 1. What is the "evil eye"? 2. What makes "cross-eyes," and what can I do to overcome them?

1. The "evil eye" was an ancient superstition, based upon the notion that the eyes of

A BULGARIAN GIRL

The Transformation of a Nation

Bulgaria's Capital Under Turkish Rule, and as it Appears To-day

BY A SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT

It is now considerably over a quarter of a century since I first visited Sofia, then a Turkish town of perhaps 10,000, and the seat of a Kaimakan or Sub-Governor. I had ridden in from Nish, which, under the enlightened rule of the great reformer Midhab Pasha, boasted wide, well-paved streets; a fine schoolhouse, which has since served as the Serbian House of Parliament; and a new bridge over the Shava, which was pointed out as a model of Turkish engineering skill. Accompanied by an escort of Turkish policemen, I threaded the dismal gorges of the Dragan Pass, and listened to blood-curdling tales of the horrors inflicted on harmless travelers by the far-famed kaiduks, or Servian brigands, who infested the neighboring mountains. We then rode over the rolling slopes of the hills near Stivnitsa, later on to be the scene of the brilliant victory gained by the young Bulgarian army, under the leadership of Prince Alexander of Batberg, over the seasoned troops of King Milan of Serbia; and there, nestling under the spurs of the giant Botosch, a lofty mountain, thrown forward from the Rhodope chain, lay the town of Sofia.

The first thing that struck the eye was the church which gives its name to the town; but, like its sister office in Stamboul, St. Sofia was then a Moslem place of worship. Its minaret has long since fallen to ruin, and the church, partially restored but by no means embellished, stands as a warning to the few Turkish residents, that what has happened in St. Sofia of Bulgaria may well happen to St. Sofia of Stamboul. A short distance below the church, but well dominating the town, stood the konak of the Governor—a large, rambling, two-storied building, with the inevitable mosque at its northern end. In front lay a long garden, with a stream meandering at its foot, and another and larger mosque to the east. On the site of the Governor's konak now stands the Prince's palace. The garden has been laid out into walks, and here a Bulgarian band plays on Monday afternoon; and Bulgarian youths and maidens tell each other the old, old story under its shady groves. The large mosque still stands, but as the Moslem element has practically disappeared from Sofia, it has been converted into the National Museum. The marshy ground at the foot of the garden has been laid out in broad thoroughfares, and boasts some of the finest buildings in the city. In 1876, few of the streets were paved, and fewer still were lighted, and those few with oil lamps. There were no hotels, and practically no public buildings. Turkish soldiery thronged the streets, and either the lives of the Christian men, nor the honor of Christian women were safe. Ill-fed and rarely paid, the Turkish soldier helped himself as he pleased at the counter of the Christian shop, and no man could say him nay. Commerce was at a standstill.

Now all is changed. Sofia possesses streets which older cities in the west of Europe might well imitate and may indeed envy—broad, well-paved, and well-lighted. Electric trams serve the principal thoroughfares. The city is the junction of several railways, which run west to Vienna, east to Constantinople, north to Bucharest, and to the south a line already has been constructed to the Turkish frontier, and it only needs an imperial iradeh and a German concessionaire before direct communication is opened with the Aegean Sea. There are now many hotels, and Sofia is well endowed with public buildings. There is a fine military club, and the Union Club, though smaller, affords a hospitable welcome to all visitors to the city, which must ever cause its name to be remembered with gratitude. The National Bank, the Post, War and Foreign offices, are all fine stone buildings of imposing elevation, and yet not too large for the needs of the country. The Sobranje, or House of Parliament, stands well detached, with a fine stretch of open ground all round, and shortly a handsome memorial, to commemorate the freedom of the country from the Turks, will be erected in the circus facing its main entrance.

Nor must I forget the zoological gardens, due to the private munificence of Prince Ferdinand, which are the daily resort of hundreds of the well-to-do people of the city, whilst twice a week they are thrown open free to the poor. There are hospitals, universities, schools and colleges, notably a military college, which has done good work in the education of the Bulgarian officers.

All these improvements are the work of less than five and twenty years; but these are not all the changes one notices. The Bulgarians have developed from a down-trodden race into a race of men who have their mission to fulfil in the world, and who mean to carry it through. In the streets of Sofia, the Bulgarian woman, be she wife or maid, can wander freely, secure from all fear of insult, annoyance or molestation. At midday, laughing troops of schoolgirls may be seen in the streets, hurrying homeward from their classes; whilst in the afternoon, one sees long processions of demure maidens taking their daily exercise. All this under Turkish rule was impossible, as indeed it is impossible to-day in the streets of Constantinople.

On Friday, which is weekly market-day in Sofia, the streets are crowded with villagers in their bright costumes, bringing farm produce for sale, the quaint, brilliantly-colored embroidery of the women's garments, testifying to the love with which they have clung to the national costume through five centuries of oppression. The Bulgarian lad has no fear of walking alone with his fiancée. There is no Turkish zaptieh now to tear maid from lover or wife from husband. In the daily aspect of affairs, there is little to remind the casual visitor that a short quarter of a century ago, Bulgaria was as Macedonia is to-day. Here and there

Rev. Frank De Witt Calmage, D.D.

The Consecrated Doctor

TEXT—Gen. 30: 39:

"And the flocks brought forth cattle, ringstraked, speckled, and spotted."

LABAN, though a man of wealth and influence among the Hebrews of his day, was yet, like many rich men in our time, mean and unprincipled where a bargain was involved. In his compact with Jacob, the weak points of his character were strikingly revealed. He had two daughters. "Leah was tender-eyed, but Rachel was very beautiful;" in other words, the elder sister was homely and unattractive. She was a maiden lady whom no one cared to marry; her eyes were inflamed, or watery, or "cast;" her disposition was evidently as much askew as her eyes. Jacob was deeply in love with the younger sister; but after he had served seven long years for her, old Laban cheated him out of his promised bride, and palmed off upon the young man the unattractive elder sister. Then, in order to win the younger sister, Jacob had to serve seven more long years, and as a result, he had two wives instead of one.

At the end of his fourteen years of service, Jacob prepared to leave his father-in-law's employ. He wanted to take his two wives and go off and build a home of his own somewhere. This, however, Laban did not wish him to do. So the crafty Laban made a contract with Jacob that if he would stay and continue in charge of his herds of cattle and flocks of sheep, he, Laban, would give to the young man, as payment for his services, all the calves, and the lambs, and the kids that were born ringstraked, or speckled, or spotted. Jacob agreed to the bargain. But when he agreed, the young man was craftier than the old man. As the father-in-law had been unprincipled with Jacob, so Jacob was unprincipled now with Laban. What did Jacob do? Did he allow nature to simply take its usual course? No. He began to scheme, and to cunningly influence the colors of the calves, the kids, and the lambs about to be born. He took some rods of green poplar, and hazel, and chestnut, and laid those rods of white and black in the watering trough of the herds and the flocks. Then, when the cows, and the sheep, and the goats came to drink out of the watering troughs, the black and the white rods reflected in the water made such a startling impression upon them, that the calves, kids, and lambs born thereafter, were influenced by that prenatal shock, and most of them were ringstraked, and spotted, and speckled. Thus Jacob's herds grew larger than Laban's, and the craft of the unscrupulous son-in-law overreached the dishonesty of the father-in-law.

Influence of Mind Over Body

After Jacob placed the rods of green poplar and hazel and chestnut in the watering troughs, the startling and far-reaching effect produced upon the animals is not to be wondered at. If you place a stick in the water, by the laws of reflection that wood may seem to become a creature of life. I remember, when a lad, once dropping my fishing pole, and as it lay at the bottom of the brook the ripples made that rod look like a long serpent wriggling up-stream. As these cattle stoop to drink, I see them start back as though a venomous hissing snake were lifting up his fatal fangs to strike. My text presents one of the best instances to be found in literature of the far-reaching effect of the mind over the physical body.

We may grant to-day the influence of the mind over the body, but we do not go so far as to assert that all physical diseases or abnormalities are the direct results of mental hallucinations, as the straked, spotted, and speckled progeny of the cows, sheep and goats were the result of Jacob's wicked act. We do not advocate the theory that a surgeon's knife is only another name for a butcher's axe; that a modern hospital is only a satanic incubator; that a medicine bottle is only fools' poison; and that sickness is only a synonym for sin. But as there are thousands and tens of thousands of men and women who honestly believe in Faith Cure, pure and simple, as we term that definition, I have chosen in this sermon to preach on Jesus Christ as the Divine Healer, and to show both from a Biblical and a common-sense standpoint, that the surgeon's knife and the physician's prescription have a part in the world's Christianization and civilization, as well as the minister's pulpit and the consecrated school-teacher's desk.

The Bible teaches us that Faith should always go hand-in-hand with Works. The same divine laws which apply to men in ordinary walks of life, apply also to the patient in the invalid's room, or upon the hospital operating table. The Christ who stands by the sick-bed is the same Christ who accompanies us when, in health and strength, we go forth to fight the great battle of life. Christ wants no drones in the busy human beehives of the world's struggle for daily bread. He wants no drones in the world's struggle for physical health. That struggle ought to be just as commendable in man's sight as is the struggle for daily bread. In the final extremity, when all human effort is exhausted, we may look to God alone; but until that point is reached we must both work and pray; work ceaselessly, and bravely, and hopefully, and invoke the Divine blessing on our labors.

The Trend of Bible Teaching

But though the whole trend of the Bible teaches that Works and Faith, as twin sisters, should go hand-in-hand in search of the waters of physical health, yet Faith Curists blind their eyes and stop their ears to these Biblical teachings. They get a hold of one little passage of Scripture and separate it from all its surrounding connections. As a sweet morsel, they turn it over and over and over again. They magnify it. They distort it, and then they rest their entire belief upon it. These people may be good at heart, but they treat Scripture somewhat as a famous reformer did in the noted meeting he had with John Calvin in Munich, I believe, in about the year 1540. After he had valiantly helped to fight the battle of the Reformation to a glorious and a successful issue, he still clung tenaciously to the doctrine of Transubstantiation. That doctrine, in plain language, means that when we drink of the communion wine and eat of the communion bread, we literally are drinking of Christ's blood and eating of Christ's body. The other school of theological thought held that when we assemble at the communion table, we only eat of Christ's body and drink of Christ's blood in symbol. We eat and drink in symbol, as the lamb's blood shed upon the Jewish altar was the symbol of Christ's blood about to be shed for us. This battle over transubstantiation raged bitterly for years between the two schools of religious thought. In order to bring this theological conflict to a close, the two schools persuaded the two leaders, John Calvin and this mighty man, to meet and discuss the theological questions at issue. What did this famous reformer do at that conference? History tells us that he brought along a tablecloth, upon which was embroidered these six words, taken from the twenty-sixth chapter of Matthew, "Take, eat; this is my body." Then he placed that cloth over a table and simply rested his hand upon it and said nothing. No matter what arguments were brought forward, he answered nothing. All that he did was to point to the one sentence written upon the table, "Take, eat; this is my body." "But," said John Calvin, "Christ also said, 'I am the vine, ye are the branches.' Are you going to take that sentence literally? Does that sentence imply that Jesus is a stick?" But the reformer would answer nothing. All that he did was to point to the one sentence upon the table, which read, "Take, eat; this is my body." So in the same way the Faith Curists, pure and simple, will not accept the trend of the Bible's teachings. They will not compare passage with passage. They will not see that every leaf of every chapter of every book of the Bible teaches that Faith must go hand-in-hand with Works. They will not see that it is almost impossible to find an incident where Christ healed the sick, unless at the same time he compelled action upon the part of those whom he would physically help.

The Divine Example

Did not Christ compel action upon the part of him that was blind? After he had anointed the blind eyes with a moist clay, did he not say unto the young man, "Go, wash in the pool of Siloam. He went his way therefore, and washed, and came seeing." Did not Christ compel action upon the part of the ten lepers? "Go, show yourselves unto the priests. And it came to pass as they went, they were cleansed." Did not God compel the leper, Naaman, to leave the far-off Damascus and dip seven times in the Jordan, before his flesh became like unto that of a little child? I am not here advocating any heretical idea that Christ cannot and will not, in many cases, heal our physical diseases. But I assert that, as a people, we have no more right to expect the Divine Physician to answer our prayers for health without any co-operative effort on our part, than we have a right to expect our Divine Commissary to give us our daily bread without our working for it. We have just as much right to kneel down at night and say the Lord's Prayer, "Give us this day our daily bread," and then, in our eagerness, to expect next morning a visionary breakfast to jump out of a visionary fire and sizzle upon a visionary broiler, and the water faucet to fill the pot with visionary coffee, or the yeast to tumble the empty bread-tray down the dummy filled with visionary hot toast, as we have to expect the sick to be made well without our own effort upon which Divine blessing has been invoked. Faith to react upon Works always in the invalid's room to go hand-in-hand with Faith.

If the Bible does not honor the physician's medical work, why did Paul, thirty years after the death of Jesus Christ, write about Luke, his fellow-traveler the "beloved physician?" If Paul did not honor the physician's profession, would he have written thus of their missionary tours, Paul saw good old Dr. Luke, sweet-faced old Doctor McLure of Drumtochty, go from the cradles of the children to the beds of the folks, and carrying physical assuagement for him wherever he went. And he wrote about good old Doctor Luke as we ourselves may have written about some beloved family physician.

If the Bible does not honor the medical profession, why did Christ use as illustration this sentence for one of his sermons: "They that be whole need not a physician, but they that are sick?" Does not that Divine statement mean, "They that are sick need a physician?" When Hezekiah was sick unto death, he prayed to God to give him a longer lease of life. God answered his prayer. But how? Through human medication. Isaiah, the prophet, told the nurse to make a poultice out of figs and put it upon the king's boil, and he recovered. Hezekiah prayed. Oh, yes. But in answer to that prayer, God told him to use a sanctified poultice. What did Paul mean when he wrote to Timothy, "take a little wine for thy stomach's sake." Paul was merely prescribing a dose of medicine for a sick league. Paul writes thus to Timothy, because the Holy Land, with but few exceptions, is noted for its impure waters; therefore Paul, as a common-sense Christ, prescribes a little medicine when he says, "Drink water, but use a little wine for thy stomach's sake." Through the Bible we find commendatory passages in these reference to doctors. In no case do we find the medical profession anathematized and ridiculed in the Bible. Tyndall, the noted synthetic philosopher, once hurled at the Christian Church his famous practical challenge. Said he, "Let us set apart two wards in a hospital,—one to be filled with men, who do not take any human medicine but prayer; the other to be filled by sick patients under the care of competent physicians. Then let us compare results, and see which is the more efficacious,—a physician's prescription or a clergyman's prayer." My brother, that challenge of Tyndall was about as foolish and unscriptural as any challenge that could possibly be issued. No man has the right to bar the Christian physicians out of the hospital ward. God honors the physician's work all through the Bible. Faith hand-in-hand with Works. Works in the hospital should go hand-in-hand with Faith.

The Importance of Human Effort

Again, Faith Cure, pure and simple, if accepted, its entirety of belief, would call a halt to the laboratory investigations made for prevention of disease, as well as the physician's cures of those diseases after they have come. It would say to Edward Jenner, "Your discovery of vaccination is useless. Disease is a condition of the mind, not of the body. Let merciful small-pox start out again if it will. The $50,000.00 voted to you by the British House of Parliament, as the greatest benefactor of your generation, was a nonsensical gift; for you have been a curse to the human race, instead of a blessing." It would say to Pasteur: "Save your inoculation for hydrophobia is itself a species of madness. If the people would only trust God and nothing, the bite of the dog afflicted with rabies would be a tonic, instead of death." It would say to Koch, Berlin, and Finsen, of Norway, "Foolish men, why hunt the bacilli of consumption and cancer with the penetrating eye of the microscope? God will and can cure disease if we will ask him. Let us pray that all the evil bacilli give one gasp and die, and they will die. The prevention of disease is entirely the work of the prayer chamber, not of the scientist's laboratory." Such advice as that rational? Is it in accord with the laws of scriptural common-sense?

Are all the results of Dr. Maillot's investigations for naught? In 1832, this famous physician, who died in 1894, was a surgeon in the French army stationed in Algeria. At that time, one in every three and a-half men sent by the French Government across the Mediterranean, died of African fever. Dr. Maillot went on in his investigation, until at last, by prescribing quinine to the African recruits, the death-rate in the French army of Algeria was changed from one in every three and one-half men to one in every twenty men. Are sanitary investigations for the purification of the water supplies made by bacteriologists to go for night? If you stop the physicians from curing diseases, then you must also stop the scientific investigations of the physicians trying to prevent diseases. To most of us, the old-fashioned doctor yet lives in the memory of our village childhood. He knew every family secret for miles around. He had heard the family skeleton rattling in many a dark closet. He was at every birth, at every marriage altar and at every funeral. With him the village church bell sounded a note almost as often as it chimed for a wedding. We knew not when we loved him the most—when he was gathering the rose-buds in the garden of the nativity, entwining the orange-blossoms, or placing the white lilies alongside of the pale cheek in the casket. There was a kind of religious rattle in his old gig. That child was the most envied of the village who could sit by his side, and hold the reins over the back of the old mare, and it seemed to be just as old as the doctor and to know it as many family secrets, yet it could not gossip more than did its master. When the boy was in the table, this kind old doctor would place his fatherly hand on the lad's shoulder and give him advice. The young rider would smile under the twinkle of his fatherly eye, as he chatted to her of her first sweetheart. Even the bees would buzz louder, and the dogs bark more happily, and their tails would wag faster, as the doctor drove along. We remember the old black bag he always carried, and the long white bandages he placed about the splints, when we fell off the hay-mow and broke our arm. The strange-looking bottles filled with pills, and the pills, too, seemed to be the same. When the minister, on the Sabbath-day, entered the pulpit and gave out the first hymn, down the church aisle the good old doctor would walk. He was always a little late for services. Doctors are always a little late. I think that is part of their education. It is never dignified for a doctor to be on time. In prayer-meeting, we loved to hear the good doctor pray. We have heard a good many great and noted ministers pray in our time, but we always thought the old doctor prayed better than any. He seemed to be so near to God—he had seen so much trouble. When the poor family over the hill was starving, he bought them food out of his own pocket. We never knew how much good he did, until after the funeral. He was part of everyone's life. He was the poor man's helper. He was the rich man's friend. One day the news went flying over the country roads: "The doctor, the good doctor is sick!" Was it not too bad that he could not prescribe for himself and take his own medicine? If he had, we know he would have become well. But he could pray. How he did pray, in his own sick-room! Then, one day the news went over the country roads, that the old doctor was dead!

While we were gathering in the home, where lay the worn-out body of the tired old physician, I can imagine that the good doctor went up to the Gates of the New Jerusalem and timidly knocked. The gateman called out, "Who is there?" The old Christian answered, "Only a poor, worn-out village doctor, who is advancing in Christ's name. Can I come in?" Then the Lord God Almighty from his throne called out, "Let him in! Let him in! Let the village doctor come in." And the angels in the celestial choir began to chime, "Let him in—Let the village doctor come!" Then all the redeemed spirits, over whose earthly death-beds he had hovered, cried, "Let him in—let our village doctor come in!" Then Christ himself, the great Physician, came forth and led the worn-out man to one of the highest thrones in heaven, as he said, "Come in, friend. This is your throne. For I was sick and ye visited me." Will you not believe in such a consecrated physician? Will you not believe that by the sick-bed, Faith can go hand-in-hand with Works and the surgeon's knife, and that the physician's prescriptions have a part in the civilization and the Christianization of the world? And will not you, oh, physician! be a Christian doctor, as well as you, oh, layman! a Christian patient? All honor, then, to our Christian physicians, whose calling and office are thus divinely consecrated, and may a blessing rest upon their earnest efforts for the alleviation of the physical afflictions of the human race.

casual vendor of fruit or of sweetmeats; here and there a casual fez may be seen. To the old traveler like myself, or to the Bulgarian of middle age, there still are landmarks which recall the past. The ancient church of Sveta Kraal, beneath which lie the bones of King Milutin of Serbia, was in those days of Turkish rule a low building; now its lofty cupolas and sonorous bells testify that Christ has triumphed over Mohammed. On the very spot where, in 1876, the patriot priest Lefski was hanged by the Turks, for his active participation in the revolution, stands an obelisk, to remind the younger generation of his example. Hard by stands another monument, erected to the memory of upwards of five hundred Russian doctors who fell in action, or died of disease, in the War of Liberation, in 1877-78. Five and twenty years ago, Sofia was as Monastir and Uskub, or as Salonica is to-day. Life and property were unsafe. Even Constantinople, with its Palace of the Five Ambassadors, is a century behind Sofia, in all that makes for civilization and human freedom.

"THE CHRISTIAN HERALD" HOUSEBOAT IN CHINA

LAST month we took a journey up the Chao River in our houseboat, which we bought by the gifts of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers. We went as far as the Chao Lake, a distance of seventy miles. Our party included two other evangelists besides myself. We were all bent upon the same mission—the salvation of souls, and reaching Christ to those who are bowing down to wood and stone. The first day out we reached our new station, Huang-lo-ho, forty miles from Wuhu. This is the second station we have opened up, what we call here the Po-liao-wei (broken yoke) district. Two years ago this district was flooded out and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD came to its relief. Now we are going to relieve in another way, giving to them the bread of Life. This new station has just been opened. Last year we rented in this town only one small room; but the people came in such large numbers that we had to rent the whole building. The second morning we sailed away, and in two days reached Chao Hsien. Here we were gladly welcomed by a large number of native believers. The following day (Sunday) we had a full day. In the morning preaching service, which was well attended, and children's meeting at two. Our communion service was held at six and I preached again at seven. On Tuesday we started overland for Han-shan—a good walk of twenty miles; yet we did it in six hours. I was surprised to find our new church there about finished and ready for services. We hope to hold a special dedication service there next month. It will seat about five hundred people. We spent two days here among the people, and then returned to our boat at Chao Hsien, where we spent two more days working with them, and then we bade good-bye. Next morning we reached Huang-lo-ho and found our evangelist had the new chapel here all ready for services. It looks very cheerful and seats about two hundred.

I have had given to me a large bronze idol, heavily gilded over with gold, and weighing about thirty pounds. It is very old and valuable as a relic. For them to give this up meant the solemn surrender of their heathen beliefs.

We continued our homeward journey and reached Wuhu Saturday evening, having traveled in all about two hundred and sixty miles and visited four stations.

We hope to keep an evangelist on our houseboat all the time, and the boat continually on the move. In this way we can reach many cities and towns. The boat will go on until it reaches a large town or city, and then it will wait over the Sabbath. The expense of keeping the boat going is very small in comparison to a boat of the same size at home. Four sailors handle her. These we pay $2.50 each, or $10 for all per month. The evangelist is $3 extra, or a total of $13 per month for all. This boat can then go to cities and towns along the rivers and lakes where the Gospel is not being preached.

"THE CHRISTIAN HERALD" HOUSEBOAT AND ITS MISSION CREW

Cruising for a Congregation

THE FLOATING CHAPEL

A SERVICE IN THE FLOATING CHAPEL

THE "SENTINEL" ON HER ROUNDS

THE skies were blue, the sun was bright, and the water calm, as a party boarded the little steam yacht Sentinel, at the foot of Pike street, East River, New York, a few days ago. Captain, engineer, and deck-hands, all agreed that the weather conditions for a cruise about the bay were perfect. The Sentinel is a tight little craft, having been a pleasure yacht before it was purchased by the Episcopal Church Missionary Society for seamen. The writer sat comfortably in the cozy pilot-house, with the serious-eyed young man from the Pike Street Mission House, who was going over to the hospital on Staten Island to visit the sick sailors, taking them various little comforts, not the least of which was the kindly sympathy which Jack readily recognizes and appreciates.

Slipping through the waters of New York bay, past the tangle of shipping at the various piers, sailing vessels and big liners, the Sentinel steamed down past Governor's Island, leaving the Statue of Liberty with uplifted torch in the background, past the bell-buoy hanging over the water with four clappers outside arranged in such a way that at least one of them was busy every second or two, as wind and wave report them in motion.

In the steam yacht's cabin, piled on tables and leather-covered seats, were hundreds of magazines and papers done up in neat bundles, ready for the sailor-boys, when the yacht visited the ships on her return.

"The boys are always glad to see the Sentinel," said the captain, "especially if it is not our first call. They have to work pretty hard when on board, and when they get leave to come with us and spend an evening up at the Mission, they make no effort to conceal their joy. It is a jolly crowd, when this cabin is full of apprentice-boys bound for an evening ashore. They all talk at once, at the top of their voices, trying to tell Mr. Wood something of special interest.

"We make three trips weekly, taking mail to and from the ships, putting aboard a quantity of reading matter, taking the sick to the hospitals, carrying officers, apprentices, and men, to and from their ships to the Mission services and entertainments."

The Chaplain, Rev. A. R. Mansfield, did not go upon this trip, being fully occupied with his work ashore.

When Mr. Wood returned from his visit to the sick sailors, he said, "Well, we get discouraged sometimes, but when I see the gratitude of those poor fellows when I visit them, and note how they hang on my words as I try to cheer them, it is then I feel and say that it is worth all our efforts."

Now began the real business of the cruise, making calls by the water-way. The dock register was consulted, and another Mission assistant, agile both as to limb and mind, began a series of visits to all sorts and conditions of craft, at their moorings in Erie Basin and Brooklyn piers. The little Sentinel would bump her nose against an intervening barge or canal boat. A rope would be made fast to anything handy, up would climb the young man, and in a moment more he would be lost to view. Shortly re-appearing, bundles of books would be handed to him; then another interval of disappearance, when he would return minus books, but with a cheery call to the captain to "land at pier so and so next." Then away the little boat would steam, puffing on her mission of comfort and good-cheer.

With the reading matter, which is eagerly seized by the sailors, went invitations to go ashore for a social hour at the Mission House in Pike Street. This was responded to whenever practicable, and by twos and fours the apprentice-boys came jubilantly on board the little yacht. Fine-looking lads they were, with their fresh young faces and happy voices.

When one stops to consider the amount of work done in a given time by this little boat, as compared with what could be accomplished in the same time on land, the wisdom of the society in purchasing and putting the Sentinel in commission is unquestionable. She can slip around the piers when the vessels and steamers are unloading, on her errands of mercy, making a half dozen calls, while a man might be threading his way through the tangle of cargoes, loading and unloading, at one of the various piers on the land side. Bishop Potter, when the little steamer was dedicated, said: "We should extend to all with whom we come in contact the benefits of our Christian religion. The sailors should carry with them the Christianity of the port from which they come, and it is our duty to help them do it. Here, also, when the sailor lands, he should be protected, and should be received with a Christian welcome that would protect him from bad influence."

And this is precisely what the Sentinel does. As she steamed back in the waning light, a little group gathered on her deck, quietly watching the beautiful scene. The pilot skilfully threaded his way among numerous tooting ferry-boats and other craft, which make the East River such a scene of never-ending activity, and soon the little steam-yacht, with the bright-faced sailor apprentices tumbling up from below, its crew at their posts, the earnest-faced young missionary, smiling in anticipation of the good time coming for his friends, and the comfort he had brought to the old men down in the hospital, and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD representative were soon at the Sentinel's berth, alongside the Floating Chapel, of which latter the good Bishop once jocosely said: "This church ought to be all, as it is 'high' or 'low,' according to the tide."

The GREAT WESTERN SPRING FLOODS

THE present year will be notable throughout the Western States for the great extent of the damage done by floods. Dispatches from Iowa, Missouri, Illinois, Indiana, Michigan and other sections of the West, show that nearly all of the rivers have risen far beyond their ordinary height during the spring, and breaking through or overflowing their banks, have, in some places, formed inland seas many miles in extent. The cities of Grand Rapids, Saginaw and Bay City in Michigan, have been partially submerged to a depth of several feet. It is estimated that in the city of Saginaw, property to the value of $500,000 has been destroyed.

The Black River, in Missouri, in some places reached a width of no less than six miles, covering many thousands of acres, while levees and other embankments have been broken through or washed away. Water rose in some portions of the city of Grand Rapids to a depth of twelve feet, driving over 10,000 people from their homes and causing widespread suffering.

Many of the rivers in Indiana and elsewhere flow through flat country, which is protected, like the territory adjacent to the Mississippi, by extensive systems of levees, some of which reach a height of twenty and twenty-five feet. They are usually constructed of earth; but at points where the current is strong, they are sometimes faced with timber or stone-work. When the streams began rising, farmers and others residing in the districts protected by the levees, took steps to strengthen them by piling bags filled with sand and earth along the tops, and constructing dams of timber work to break the force of the current; but most of these efforts were unavailing, and thousands of people living in the lowlands were obliged to desert their homes and flee for their lives, leaving everything behind, so rapidly did the waters rise.

A LEVEE WASHED AWAY—THE FLOOD COVERING THE LOWLANDS

MENDING A LEVEE WITH STONE AND SANDBAGS

OUTPOSTS CLASHING IN COREA

ONE of the most exciting and important incidents of the war, thus far, was an encounter which occurred between Russian and Japanese forces at Chon-ju, in northern Corea, on March 28.

There are, of course, two versions of the affair. Gen. Mishtchenko, the Cossack commander, reported to Gen. Kouropatkin that, having learned that four squadrons of Japanese cavalry were stationed at Chon-ju (40 miles south of the Yalu River), he dispatched six companies of Russian cavalry toward Kasan, just south of Chon-ju. As the Russian scouts approached, the Japanese fired from behind the town walls. Two Russian cavalry squadrons dismounted and occupied an adjacent height. The Japanese had a considerable force, both infantry and cavalry, lying in ambush. After a sharp fight of half an hour, the Japanese, being worsted, began to seek refuge in the houses and hoisted the Red Cross flag. At this critical juncture, heavy Japanese cavalry reinforcements were discovered approaching the town. The fight waxed warmer, and when another Japanese detachment came into view, approaching the town, the Russians mounted their horses and retired in perfect order, with their wounded in front. Three Cossacks were killed and twelve wounded, including three officers. Gen. Mishtchenko adds that the enemy were too disorganized to follow. He also reports that they must have lost heavily in men and horses.

Quite another aspect is given to this lively outpost fair by the Japanese version, which states that "our cavalry and a portion of our artillery met the enemy outside the south gate of Chon-ju, and after a severe engagement, repulsed them and took possession of the town. The enemy is estimated to have numbered about 100. They retreated in the direction of Wiju. The Japanese loss was five killed, including Lieut. Kano, and twelve wounded, including Capt. Kuro Kara of the cavalry. There were no losses in the artillery. Two Russian dead were found on the field outside of the town and eight within the town. The Russians skillfully carried away other dead on horseback to ambulances. Two officers seen to fall were carried off in this manner. Blood-stained bandages were found here and there, from which it is concluded that the Russian losses at least equalled those of the Japanese."

These conflicting versions are fairly illustrative of the character of much of the war news now coming from the East. It should be added that Gen. Kouropatkin said to have telegraphed to St. Petersburg that the Japanese lost forty killed and one hundred wounded in this skirmish. From Liao Yang, Russia's military camp in Manchuria, an official dispatch was wired to St. Petersburg announcing that the Japanese loss was fifty killed and two hundred wounded—ten times the loss of the Czar's forces." A Tokio cable throws a little more light on this remarkable battle, by the statement that the Japanese pursued the retreating Russians thirteen miles, and that hundreds of sabres and rifles were abandoned in the flight, Gen. Mishtchenko himself narrowly escaping capture. Both sides claim a victory, leaving the bewildered outside world to form its own conclusions.

Following the proclamation of martial law in New Chwang, by Russia, came the news that the American and British flags, which were displayed over the property of citizens of those nationalities, had been hauled down. This brought out a strong protest from the foreigners. It was explained, however, that the flags had been displayed over private property, and that their removal merely signified that Russia assumed responsibility for the protection of foreign lives and interests." The Russian administrator further promised to restore the flags on British and American buildings, and apologized to the Consuls. In view of these circumstances, no protest was made by either of the governments interested, both preferring to await developments at New Chwang. An exodus of foreigners is in progress. New Chwang has been strengthened for defense, as an attack by the Japanese fleet is expected.

Since the arrival of General Kouropatkin, there has been a noticeable increase in military activity at Russian headquarters; 4,000 troops now arrive at Harbin daily. Kouropatkin does not expect a decisive battle before September (according to St. Petersburg dispatches), when he hopes to have 500,000 men in the field, "with which to drive the Japanese out of Corea." Meanwhile, if the Japanese effect a landing in the valley of the Liao River, it is difficult to see how the struggle can be so long delayed. There is a rumor that a landing has already been made, and that Port Arthur will soon be invested both by sea and land.

the war. Its railroad communications are perfect, and the troops are in fine spirits since Makaroff's arrival. That active commander inspires the garrison, as well as the fleet, with his own enthusiasm. He actually "sleeps in his clothes," that he may be ready for any emergency. Occasionally, he takes his fleet outside for target practice, and to keep them in better trim for the real action which may come at any time. The forts have been repaired, as far as possible, and the whole place put in a better condition for defence. On the last "bottling up" attempt by Admiral Togo, on March 27, the fire from the Russian forts killed Commander Takso, another Japanese officer and two sailors, and wounded nine others. The Russian casualties were slight.

Reliable information as to the present disposition and numbers of the forces on either side in Corea is difficult to obtain. In northern Corea, it is believed there are at least 100,000 Japanese, only small detachments being in the south. Eight per cent. of the army is represented as sick and unfit to march; but the spring weather is at hand, and the troops are cheerful. Ten thousand Japanese have crossed the Chongchang River. Japanese cavalry now occupy Kasan. Their Korean allies have proved worthless. The Korean garrison at Pyeng-Yang deserted or revolted, en masse, when ordered to the front. Korean troops have fled at the first approach of even small bodies of Cossacks. The Japanese hold them in contempt.

Three detachments of Russians are said to be on the Yalu, with their centre at Wiju, and their flanks at Chyansong and Yongchong. The main force is in southern Manchuria. Some time ago, twenty-five thousand Russian troops were dispatched from Ussuri in two columns, to advance toward the centre of Corea, the first column along the Tumen River, and the other along the east coast. The former were Cossacks and mountain artillery. Toward the end of March the Russian forces in northern Corea were considerably increased, and the Japanese will encounter strong resistance before the Yalu River is reached. As they advance, they hear of Cossack patrols everywhere along the valleys and mountain roads. Several Japanese warships are said to be in command of the Yalu passage some distance below Wiju. This little squadron includes the cruisers Miyako and Akashi, the gunboats Asaki and Yalyama, and the torpedo gunboat Chiyata. These vessels will very likely play an important part in any battle along the Yalu.

A report from Vladivostok is that the Japanese who landed at Chemulpho are carrying out a turning movement east of Pyeng-Yang, with the intention of fortifying themselves on the line from Kangge to Unsan, thereby extending their entrenched position between Yongpyon, Anju, Pakchong and Chasan. Gen. Kouropatkin, to check this movement, decided to advance the Russian cavalry, infantry and sappers along the Yalu from Nitchju to Kasan, on the banks of the Tonnogan River, a tributary of the Yalu. The sappers will construct intrenchments for the artillery and infantry. An artillery force has occupied Yanposhan, and Russian troops are also holding Anchau, Takushan and Tatung-kau, the base being Fengwangshong. The cavalry horses are said to be weak from starvation. The Russian task is to prevent the Japanese from crossing the Yalu or Tumen rivers and entering Manchuria. Gen. Mishtchenko has reported to Gen. Kouropatkin his estimate of the strength of the Japanese force now advancing against Manchuria, as follows: 55,000 infantry, to which fully 25,000 have lately been added; 4,500 cavalry, 3,600 artillery, with 180 guns; 3,000 military engineers, and 3,000 transport troops. The Russian authorities consider this force inadequate for attacking Manchuria, though the artillery is recognized as being strong, compared with Russia's 196 guns distributed throughout the Far East at the commencement of the war.

Gen. Allen, United States military attache in Corea, says it is evident that the Russians do not intend to make a stand south of the Yalu. Apparently, he thinks, this is a mistake, for he says the country offers excellent opportunities for checking the Japanese advance.

PORT ARTHUR FORTS REPLYING TO AN ATTACK BY JAPANESE WARSHIPS

MAJOR-GENERAL K. TAIKAMOTO
Japan's Cavalry Commander in Corea

Admiral Makaroff's gallant defense of the port, was still successful in keeping an open channel for his fleet up to April 1, though the passage was an exceedingly narrow and dangerous one, owing to the sunken hulks placed there by the Japanese. Admiral Togo is preparing to sink a dozen or more steamers at the harbor mouth. It is apparently the Japanese plan to close it up so tightly that, when the decisive struggle comes, and the Mikado's fleets are needed at the Yalu and off the western side of the Liao-tung peninsula, Makaroff's ships will be powerless to complicate the situation. Port Arthur, notwithstanding all its bombardments, is declared to be stronger now than it was at the beginning of

The Faith of the Simple

PILATE asked, "What is Truth?" His question is echoed by the sceptics of our own day. They assert that their opinions or conclusions are truth; but there are a thousand other equally honest thinkers, who make a similar assertion, while each upholds a different conclusion.

Truth is not what a man thinks, nor even what, with utmost sincerity, he may believe; for the thought is liable to wander into error; and the resultant belief, being founded in error, is itself a lie. Truth—the Divine Truth—is not to be reached by the processes of the mind, nor by the individual or collective efforts of the most profound thinkers and investigators. It is outside the domain of intellectual inquiry, and not to be measured by the methods of human science and subjected to the laws of human logic; it is founded on the eternal verities, changeless, fixed, inflexible; pervading all things and only to be known and understood by those who are in accord with Him who is the source of Truth.

One of the greatest and ablest of modern sceptics, when drawing toward the end of life, wrote that he had at last reached the conviction that there was in religion a certain something which was wholly outside the range of the processes of human reason. The distinguished doubter, after a life-time of disputation, in the vain effort to construct from the attractive counterfeits of Truth, a theology of his own, had at last begun to comprehend that there must be something, after all, in that religion which transforms the lives and brings joy and peace into the hearts of multitudes of the unlearned and uncritical. Especially was he mystified by the simple act of faith, whereby the penitent sinner reaches up and receives pardon and blessing. Intellectual pride forbade the surrender of life-long errors and the acceptance of that unexplained something which seemed illogical and incredible, and so his spiritual vision was obscured to the end.

No man, by the power of his intellect alone—not even though he were master of all the learning taught in the world's chief universities—can elevate himself, by his own act, from the material life to the higher plane of the spiritual. Let us recognize the fact that there is a point which marks the limits of all intellectual inquiry, and bounds all the processes of the human mind. "Canst thou by searching, find out God?" asks Zophar the Naamathite. "The Lord knoweth the thoughts of the wise," says Paul; "that they are vain . . . The natural man receiveth not the things of the spirit, for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them, for they are spiritually discovered. . . . For the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God." There is a realm beyond the farthest limit of man's investigation, beyond all his science and his logical deductions; yet it lies all around us, on every hand. Its innumerable gates open to the key of Faith alone, the simple, unquestioning faith of a child, for "whosoever shall not receive the Kingdom of God as a little child, he shall not enter therein."

Old Age and Teachers

NO class of public servants, in any capacity serving, have so great a claim on the public gratitude as have those who teach the rising generation. An army of young women go forth every morning to work in the schoolroom, doing faithfully what their hands find to do. They take their pupils as they come; sometimes from homes of rare grace and refinement, sometimes from households illiterate and uncouth. Under the gentle care of the teacher, the children of the foreign-born population, or the foreign-born children themselves—an immense contingent in our cities, and an appreciable element everywhere in our vast territory—learn to love the flag. They salute it daily. They are taught patriotism, loyalty, the gospel of clean hands and pure lives. Even in States where the Bible is prohibited in the public schools, no legislature can exclude the vital and beneficent influence of living epistles, known and read of all men, the influence of those who are God-fearing and God-loving people. We have men, fine and noble, and broad of culture, and far-seeing of purpose, in the ranks of our teachers; but women preponderate in numbers.

The work is absorbing and exhausting. The life is intensely wearing. The salaries of teachers are never munificent. A college president receives about the same wage as the chef of a great hotel. Public school teachers work strenuously, for, in many cases, parsimonious payment. When they grow old, and a new school board comes in, clamoring for newer methods, there is no other work they can do, and though retired in some places on half pay, and in others, pensioned, this is for a very prolonged term of consecutive service in a single place; and it is by no means a universal rule everywhere. The teacher, grown old and shelved, cannot now acquire another profession. The fires of youth are burned to dull ashes. Health is not now buoyant. One who looks at the condition of veteran teachers with dispassionate eyes, cannot but be sorry for them, and wish that among other gifts and benefactions, our generous multi-millionaires might be pleased to endow some home, or found some endowing annuity, that might be simply and solely for the advantage of teachers, grown old in their useful sphere.

A Notable Centenary

ON a recent Sunday, the hundredth anniversary of the founding of the British and Foreign Bible Society was celebrated throughout Christendom. A public meeting was held in Washington, at which Supreme Court Justice Brewer delivered an address; and in many other cities the event was the subject of pulpit reference. In London, a service was held in St. Paul's Cathedral, to which the Queen and the Prince and Princess of Wales went, with other members of the royal and noble families. The King would also have attended, but was detained at home by illness. The Archbishop of Canterbury lauded the work of the venerable society, which was described in a former number of this journal. During the hundred years of its existence it has put into circulation over one hundred and eighty million copies of the Scriptures, and has printed them in three hundred and sixty-seven different languages and dialects.

It is not possible to conceive of a grander or more beneficent work, and the completion of the centenary of the society is therefore justly regarded as an event of international importance.

The St. Louis Exposition

AS the time approaches for the formal opening of the World's Fair at St. Louis, the eyes of the nation are directed toward the Exposition city. That it will be a beautiful and noble spectacle, as to architecture, sculpture, and interior and exterior decoration, is assured, and that in the extent and variety of its exhibits, it will rival any of its American predecessors seems also certain. Ample arrangements are made for the reception of the great multitude of visitors who are expected to attend the opening ceremonies, as well as for those who will pour into St. Louis in a continuous stream while the Exposition remains open.

In former issues, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD directed the attention of its readers to a by no means reassuring rumor which had widely been circulated, that there was a special danger threatening young women who went to St. Louis alone, either seeking employment or as visitors to the Exposition. So persistently was this statement reiterated from various quarters—it came from half a dozen States—that we believed it to be an imperative duty to give heed to the warning, and to adopt precautionary measures. Mayor Wells, of St. Louis, replying to our inquiry, telegraphed an unqualified denial of the reports that an immoral syndicate existed, or that any movement had been organized which would injuriously affect the comfort or the safety of visitors in the remotest degree.

It is not to be assumed, therefore, that any facts that would justify the rumors in question, have come to the knowledge of Mayor Wells and his official associates. But the Mayor of St. Louis, in the present case, owes it not to the Exposition city only, but to the nation, to employ every legitimate means at his command to keep the city morally pure and wholesome during the Exposition. It is within his power, by the adoption of drastic measures in dealing with the lawless and immoral element, to reassure the people who have been alarmed by these discomfiting reports, which, as Mayor Wells should remember, had their origin in his own city. He can, if he will, allay all fears by making every street square of St. Louis absolutely safe. And this can be accomplished by adopting the methods that have been used repeatedly and successfully in New York—corolling and driving out all suspicious and immoral characters, increased police vigilance, and quick justice in local courts to such offenders when arrested.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has sounded the note of warning. We trust that it will not pass unheeded, and that the officials of St. Louis will take such action as is urgently demanded to guarantee the utmost security and protection to every woman who may go there, either for business, or as a spectator. Public sentiment will uphold Mayor Wells in all that he does with this subject in view.

Sound Advice to Young Men

QUIT sowing wild oats—quit at once. There is only one bit of advice better than this, and that is—never begin! Wild oats ripen, as a rule, by gas-light, and the light is turned off for a night that never ends.

—Stealing makes a man a thief. Don't be a thief "tricks in trade," or "smart bargains," or gambling.

—When your companions make sport and fun of "old folks at home," you get up and leave at once. There is not much decency left in a man when he loses respect for mother.

—Keep company with nice young women. See them often with them frequently; but the one who is bold, who uses language lightly, and smiles at things that should chill instead of thrill—cut her from your list before the sun sets.

—Go to church on Sunday. What if the preacher is a little prosy. Don't be so small in your mental make-up to imagine a church service is made by the pulpit alone. Go there because you can worship God, and pray.

—Be as full of fun as a pudding is full of sweets; but when jest is made over sacred things, and vile stories are told, y frown like a thunder-storm.

—Keep your word, in small and great things alike. A man was never liked on earth nor in heaven. If you say "I will be there at twelve o'clock," be on the spot at eleven sixty to the tick.

Among the Workers

—W. W. BENTLEY, the song evangelist, has been assisting Pastor W. G. Mayer, of St. Paul's M. E. Church, Pen Grove, N. J., the past month in special services. The community was greatly stirred, the church wonderfully revived and precious souls won.

—CROSSBY AND HUNTER, the Canadian evangelists, have just closed a successful union campaign in Picton, Ontario. Over 600 enlisted for Christ during the meetings and more than 1,000 signed the total abstinence pledge. These evangelists are now in Indianapolis, Ind.

—EVANGELISTS HART and MAGANN, of Fairbury, Ill. have just closed a three weeks' revival in the First Methodist Church, Mount Vernon, Ill. This building was packed nightly. There were four hundred and seventeen professions during these meetings, including judges, constables, policemen, merchants and artisans.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

Massacre in Thibet

NEWS comes from northern India that the British expedition, which, as stated in these columns recently, was starting to Lhasa, has been attacked by a Thibetan force, and has had a severe engagement, resulting in the defeat of the Thibetans. The British force has been encamped for several weeks at Suna, about two hundred miles from Lhasa, the capital of Thibet. Its halt there was due to a notice from the Grand Lama, that while he was willing to receive Col. Younghusband, and one or two attendants, on his diplomatic mission, he would not permit an armed escort to enter Lhasa. Being informed that the British officer had orders to proceed, the Thibetan ruler warned him that a further advance would be opposed by force. Col. Younghusband then left his camp and returned to India for consultation. On his return, with re-enforcements the march was resumed. The expedition suffered severe hardships, the cold being intense and the snow deep. On approaching Guru, where the Thibetans were encamped, a Thibetan general demanded that the expedition return to the frontier, where negotiations would be resumed. Col. Younghusband replied that it was fifteen years since the treaty had been arranged, and during that time negotiations had been carried on without success; he should therefore wait no longer, but proceed to Lhasa, and assured the general that the expedition was peaceful, but would resist if molested. The expedition accordingly set out, but had not penetrated more than four miles when the Thibetans opened fire. The British were taken by surprise, but when the guns were brought into position, the Thibetans were scattered at the first fire. They had evidently no previous idea of the power of modern ordnance. They made a stand behind the fortifications, but were mowed down by the Maxim guns, and were cut out with great slaughter. About two hundred prisoners were taken. The rifles with which they were armed bore the Russian official stamp, which confirms the suspicion, which led to the expedition, that the Lama was in league with Russia, and was being encouraged by that Power to resist the British demands. Viewed from any standpoint, the conflict is most deplorable. It is sickening to read of the slaughter of the brave but misguided men, who, resisting intrusion into their land, should have been shot down remorselessly. As at Omdurman, the personal courage of the poor creatures counted for nothing against the destructive engines of modern warfare. They had no idea of the awful result of packing a force so equipped. It is terrible to think of a peaceful people being made to pay the penalty of the mutual jealousy of two European Powers. There is no doubt that Great Britain suspected Russia of a desire to absorb Thibet, and determined to restrain her. The Thibetans have been between the upper and nether millstones. It may be hoped that good may yet come out of evil, in Thibet being opened, not only to the insatiable trader, but to the missionary, who has hitherto to a new market; but to the missionary, who has waited so long for entrance into this—almost the last land to which he has been denied admission. Even out of the unholy passions of men, God is able to bring his purposes to pass, and, out of this deplorable slaughter, one more stage may be reached toward the fulfillment of the prophecy of the Prince of Peace:

This Gospel of the Kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations. (Matt. 24: 14).

ing of the case, it was incidentally mentioned that her grown-up son and her married daughter had been living with her. The judge, therefore, ordered them to be examined, too, and it was found that both had contracted the disease. They were committed to the camp; but a question then arose about the daughter's baby, an infant only a few weeks old. She begged that they would not separate her from her child. The physician certified that the infant did not have the disease, and advised that the mother's plea be denied. The judge, however, was moved by the mother's distress, and believing that the child might die if deprived of maternal care, and would probably develop the hereditary taint in any case, permitted the mother to take it with her. His decision seals the doom of the child. Perhaps in years to come, the mother, seeing her child suffer, will herself regret taking it with her. There is reason to fear that many a mother who has the leprosy of sin in her being will experience similar sorrow, as she sees her children going to ruin as a result of association with herself.

I said unto their children, Walk ye not in the statutes of your fathers. Notwithstanding the children rebelled against me (Ezek. 20: 18, 21).

A Child Pawned

A dispute is now before a Court in Mexico, which reveals unnatural conduct on the part of a mother. She admitted that when she was short of funds, she had been in the habit of pawning her eight-year-old son. For a time she used to pawn her offspring with some neighbors, who used the little boy as a servant until he was redeemed. They paid nothing for his services, but exacted a high interest for their money invested in the operation. More recently she found a Spanish pawnbroker who lent her money on her son, and used him as a clerk in his shop. A few days ago the woman redeemed her son from the pawnbroker, but subsequently found herself without money again, and pawned the boy with a woman who loaned the mother ten dollars. With this the mother went to visit a number of pulque shops and taverns, and when she had spent the money, she called upon the woman and demanded that her son be given back to her. A quarrel ensued, a gendarme intervened, and the whole affair was disclosed at the police station. This was making merchandise of her child, but there are some mothers who, like the mother of the prophet, have taken a holy joy in disposing of the services of their children.

I have lent him to the Lord; as long as he liveth he shall be lent to the Lord (I. Samuel 1: 28).

Charmed to Court

A policeman in a country district on Long Island adopted novel tactics to get a prisoner to court on April 2. She had been arrested on a charge of vagrancy, and was suspected of having stolen a number of articles of clothing and other goods that she was carrying in a satchel. At the police station she acted in so eccentric a way that suspicions of her sanity were aroused. During the night she became violent, and in the morning it was necessary to put her in a strait jacket. In a short time she quieted down, and the police proposed taking her to court. Then she resisted violently, and the efforts of two men failed to get her into the patrol wagon. While they rested, some one outside was heard singing a popular song. The demented woman listened intently, and her whole demeanor changed. She became quiet, and apparently reasonable. When the song ceased, she again became violent. One of the policemen, acting on the hint, started a song, and again the woman calmed down. He continued singing, and the woman went with him in docile fashion to court, the policeman singing all the way. There a commitment on the ground of insanity was made out. Perhaps the doctors, who now have her in charge, may learn the way to her permanent cure, by this curious effect of music on her. Ministers and Christian workers may also take a hint from the incident. Though they do not have to do with demented people, they may succeed in reaching the hearts of sinners more readily and surely by the accents of love and tenderness than by denunciation and threats.

We are ambassadors for Christ as though God did beseech you by us; we pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled unto God (II. Cor. 5: 20).

BRIEF NOTES

Among the recent additions to the membership of the Christian Endeavor Society, is Dr. Collins, Bishop of Gibraltar.

The American Tract Society has issued during the past two years, 750,000 publications in various languages and dialects.

Among the surgeons who have volunteered for hospital and field work in the Russo-Japanese War, are 140 Jews, all of whom hold diplomas of high order.

The Christian Endeavor Society now comprises 64,380 societies, of which 44,360 are in the United States, and 8,800 in Great Britain, and 4,047 in Canada.

There are now laboring on the Congo mission field 200 missionaries representing seven societies. They work among a population of 20,000, speaking 50 languages. The native Christians number 6,000.

The Sunday School pilgrims on the way to Jerusalem stopped off at Athens, and heard a sermon by Dr. John Potts, on Mars' Hill, on Sunday, March 27. It is welcome news that all the members of the party were in good health.

An International Conference of the Salvation Army is to be held in London, in June. Army officers from all parts of the world in which the Salvationists are working, will attend. A large hall is to be erected specially to accommodate the meetings.

The murderer of Rev. B. W. Labaree in Persia has been identified, but not arrested. He is in hiding near Mt. Ararat. He is said to be a confirmed criminal, with other murders to his charge. The Persian Government is acting vigorously in the matter of his arrest, and is strictly enforcing all laws protecting Christians.

Evangelist Sunday's revival services at Sterling, Ill., have surpassed everything previously known in that section. For five weeks the meetings went on, the numbers increasing day by day. It is believed, says the Sterling Evening Gazette, that over sixteen hundred persons were brought to decision for Christ during the services.

The dates of the summer conferences of the Young People's Missionary Movement are officially announced as follows: The Western Conference at Winona Lake, Ind., June 17-26; the Southern Conference at Lookout Mountain, Tenn., July 1-10; and the Northern Conference at Silver Bay, on Lake George, N. Y., July 22-31.

Babe in a Leper Camp

A judge in New Orleans, La., had a difficult case to decide a few days ago. Under a recent act of the Legislature, persons suspected of leprosy are sent to the District Court, where an order is made for them to be examined by a duly authorized physician. If he certifies that they have the disease, the Court commits them to the Leper Camp at Iberville, where they are detained for the remainder of their lives. On March 4, a woman was thus committed, and during the hear-

WHEN the eventful day arrives, and the gates of the Magical City are thrown open to the public, one will find it hard to realize that within the last three years St. Louis could have accomplished so much toward bringing the Fair to artistic completion. Although the Exposition is of enormous extent, beauty and delicacy have not for one moment been overlooked. No glaring white, no heavy colors, but instead, each building is of a soft ivory tint, and the towers, domes and roofs are of light, airy colors. As one stands near the Administration Building—or better still, at the crowning point of the whole grounds, Festival Hall—and gazes out across the cascades bordered by statues, lagoons, enclosed by colonnades, and roofs surmounted by turrets of rainbow hues, it seems that one is in a fairyland, so beautiful, so dreamful is it all.

Not only is the scene beautiful in the effect of the whole, but as we stand and gaze and gradually master the entire scene, the details, one by one, reveal themselves to view. Reflected in the lagoon we see the buildings, then separate them into parts, colonnades, arched doorways, towers and turrets. What is the of the beauty of these palaces. Should you visit the Fair, you will doubtless ask yourselves this same question. Perhaps this may be one mission of the great Exposition. At least the people will see what might be done, and let us hope that what might be done, may be done.

Because of the great improvements and new discoveries in electricity, the Pan-American Exposition at Buffalo was able to outshine the World's Fair at Chicago. Surely, then, St. Louis will take advantage of the great advances made since 1900. The buildings at night will be a blaze of light. Crook's tubes and the Marconigraph will be in constant use. Electric chandeliers and launches will add to the pleasure and comfort of visitors. The most vivid and lasting impressions that will be taken away by the vast majority of people, will be the wonders of electric lighting, which is to be used in connection with thundering waterfalls and long stretches of lagoon in a way never before attempted.

So many persons ask: "Will the St. Louis Fair be as big as the Chicago World's Fair?" Yes, larger. It will cover twelve hundred and forty acres—nearly 10 square miles—which is as large an area as was covered style of architecture? Perhaps we might say a free treatment of the renaissance; but it is free. It is perhaps best described by the remark of one of the architects, when he said that this term meant, "Carte blanche to produce a beautiful effect by the use of any architectural device that gladdens the eye of man, from the pediment and peristyle of the Parthenon, to the dome and minaret of the Taj Mahal."

The buildings are a soft ivory tone on the exterior. Color is also being extensively used in the arched colonnades surrounding several of the larger buildings. This mural decoration is not carelessly done, as one might naturally expect, since it is to stand for only seven months; but the artists who did the work have had a care as to how it shall appear for even so short a time, and have seemed to think that "whatever is worth doing at all is worth doing well."

I have often wondered, and have frequently heard others also wonder, why business houses, office buildings and public edifices, might not be built with something by the World's Fair in Chicago, the last Paris Exposition and the Pan-American Exposition at Buffalo, put together. There will also be forty-eight more acres under roof than at the World's Fair in Chicago. You will have to walk rapidly for six minutes to go from one end of the Palace of Agriculture to the other. It is sixteen hundred feet long, and covers twenty-three acres. A number of the other buildings are nearly as large. Foreign countries are spending over $1,000,000 more than they did at Chicago in representation; the States and Territories of this country are exceeding the World's Fair by a total of $1,500,000.

What is The Pike? You will know it best by the well-remembered title, "The Midway," in Chicago. Remembering this, concessioners of The Pike are trying to make it very attractive; so attractive, indeed, that they may charge a higher price for admission than do the Midway people. "The Cliff-Dwellers," "The Tyrolean Alps," "The Galveston Flood," "The Creator and many other features, will have their sentinels, informing you that their show is the "greatest on earth," with variations.

I am quite sure that many people who visit the Fair, will be impressed with the sculpture. It will impress them, not only because of the great number of statues, but because of the charm of its classic beauty classic in its finish, but truly American in its subject. Facing the lagoon, are such groups as "The Cowboy at Rest," "The Pizzard," and "The Indian War Dance." At the top of the cascades, stands the "Spirit of the Atlantic" and the "Spirit of the Pacific." On either side of the three cascades, over which tumble and rush ninety thousand millions of water per minute, we find many groups in keeping with the dashing water—Cupids and fishes in playful postures, apparently floating and sporting, do the waters in their tumbling. Uniting the widely divergent heads of the cascades, is the crescent-form of the Colonnade of States. An inviting restaurant, from which much of the grounds may be seen, terminates either end of this colonnade. In the centre is the Festival Hall, containing the largest pipe-organ ever built. Between Festival Hall and the restaurants is the Colonnade, the inner side of which and gigantic statues, each presenting a figure which has been carved from the original Louisiana Purchase. Look well these statues, for they are nearly all done by the younger sculptors. Here is the exhibition of movement in the form of the actual manufacture of almost every conceivable thing connected with our modern civilization. Nothing exhibited will be without its neighboring adjunct, showing how it is manufactured. Movement in the Machinery Building, where the crowning achievement of American skill is exhibited in the form of a giant locomotive, whizzing on a turntable, every wheel revolving at high speed by compressed air power. About this locomotive will be gathered all the types of the world's locomotives, from the earliest to the most modern. Movement in every one of the fifteen palaces; in the forty ur State and fifty foreign buildings; in the twelve acres where Jerusalem, with all its quaintness and odd customs, will be depicted; in the forty acres where the Filipinos show every phase of their interesting life. In every form possible, life and motion will permeate each exhibit of this wonderful Fair; interesting, enlightening, ennobling the visitor, from this and every other country.

St. Louis' Anti-Vice Crusade

ST. LOUIS is now in the midst of an anti-vice crusade. The town has been growing worse for the past fifteen months, until it is now impossible to keep correct account of the number of desperate characters, and immoral and disreputable houses, in the city. The lines which were drawn strictly before the World's Fair crowds began to assemble, have been stretched, until the whole town has been engulfed, as it were. A recent report of the excise commissioner showed that there is one saloon for every fifty-four men, or three hundred more saloons than in 1903, or a total number of saloons, exclusive of beer gardens, of 2,600. The crusade has extended to the closing of some of these saloons. The crusade has been directed by a central body of the clergymen of St. Louis. They have worked with the women and Christian Associations in securing the revoking of the licenses of certain saloon-keepers. The "wine rooms," it is expected, will be closed during the World's Fair. James Eads How, nephew of the builder of the Eads Bridge and a multi-millionaire worker in the slums here, is the leader in the reform movement. A fund of $5,000 has been subscribed by the Central Home Protective Association for the purpose of clearing a certain neighborhood of saloons and wine rooms. In the district there are fifteen churches, three schools, seventy saloons, and eight hundred houses of ill-repute. The owners of the property where most of these houses and saloons are located have been won over by the vice crusaders. A fund of $25,000 is being raised to fight the vice trust. Mayor Wells and Chief of Police Kieley both profess to be only too happy to aid in the good work.

Considerable excitement was caused in police and moral circles generally, by published reports that 50,000 undesirable women were being imported by a vice syndicate, with headquarters at Philadelphia. Such information, while greatly exaggerated, was somewhat true. The syndicate has been dissolved, on account of the arrest of several of its leaders. The city is slowly but surely cleansing itself prior to the Fair.

WITNESSING HERALDS OF CHRIST

THE MISSION OF THE SEVENTY

BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS*

WHEN Christ was about to begin his ministry in Judea, his way was prepared by one herald, John the Baptist; but his ministry in Perea, near the end of his life on earth, was prepared for by seventy heralds. Perea was a province of Palestine, east of the Jordan, in which Jesus had not as yet done any of his mighty works. It had mostly a shepherd population, being located on a high plain, favorable for grazing. There were a few villages and cities, but of no distinction. Christ's baptism had occurred at Bethabara, a town or ford of Perea. Few, if any, of the people of Perea had ever gone to Jerusalem for the great feasts, as other people of Palestine were wont to do, and so Jesus was unknown to them. Some of them may have heard John the Baptist foretell the coming of the Son of God, but not many, for John's preaching was mostly done on the west side of the Jordan. It is true John was in Perea for nearly two years, but he was as Herod's prisoner in the Castle of Macherus, where he may have spoken of Christ to a few people about the prison. But now Christ would reach the shepherds in their valleys. He would bring to them the fulfilment of the message brought by the angels to those other shepherds on Bethlehem's plain: "Unto you is born a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord."

spoke some of his greatest parables. The Good Samaritan, The Importunate Neighbor, The Foolish Rich Man, The Great Supper, The Lost Sheep, The Prodigal Son, The Unjust Steward, Dives and Lazarus, The Pharisee and the Pharisee, etc., thirteen parables in all. And it was there that he blessed little children, saying, "Suffer little children to come unto me." It was there that he taught us to pray, "Our Father who art in Heaven." His ministry in Perea was broken in upon by the urgent call to Bethany, on account of the sickness of Lazarus. Following the raising of Lazarus from the dead, Christ retired briefly to Ephraim, and then returned to Perea to complete his ministry, which he did but a few days before he went up to Jerusalem to attend that last Passover, before his crucifixion.

Illustration and Application

The preaching of the apostles represents the preaching of ordained ministers, but the seventy of this lesson are laymen, who represent the Christian witnessing of plain people, not in meetings only, or chiefly, but in house to house and wayside Christian conversation. Doing is more than talking in Christian life, but the person who will not give Christ even a word is not likely to give him a deed. Talking in meeting is not so important as tactful testimony in daily life, but the person who will not say a word for Christ in a company of his friends is not likely to stand for him in the boarding-house or club when he must stand alone. The lesson suggests (1) public Christian testimony, and (2) private Christian conversation—most of all (3) house to house visitation in Christ's Name.

Why should not every one present in a prayer meeting

COAST SCENE IN MODERN TYRE

One herald was not sufficient to go into all the byways, nor two, nor three, but seventy. There were dangers on every hand, because of the many ravines, which were gathering places for robbers. Perhaps this is one reason why they were told to carry neither purse nor scrip—that is, neither money nor treasure of any sort. The Lord's business also demanded haste, and they must not be impeded by any unnecessary thing. For the same reasons they were told not to salute any by the way. Oriental salutations are prolonged ceremonies, and there was no time for idle words. Safety and cheering fellowship in service were secured by their being sent two by two not singly. They were instructed Jesus to enter into every house and carry the message of "Peace." They were given power to heal the sick as the seal of their authority. Results exceeded their expectations, for they reported with joy to Christ on their return, "Even the demons are subject unto us in thy Name." "In this," says Edersheim, "they had exceeded the letter of Christ's commission; but as they made experiment of it, their faith had grown, and they had applied his command to heal the sick to the worst of all sufferers, those grievously vexed by demons."

The extensiveness of the preparation for Christ's ministry in Perea, was an earnest of what was to follow, for it was there that he have a part, as every one in a parlor gathering is expected to participate in the conversation? At-home-iveness should be cultivated, and participation in meetings be made more conversational and less like speech-making. Over and over again it needs to be said that we are called to testify, not necessarily to "edify." But one can not speak helpfully without preparation. One has said that "with many the problem of how to speak in meeting, is the problem of how to hit the mark with a blank cartridge." In order to speak effectively, what is said must be not alone something learned, but something lived. When we have a full life, it will overflow without effort in living words. It is easier for a preacher to give a prayer-meeting lecture, than to train his people to do the talking in their meeting; but it is far better for the church to develop the talking powers of the people. Sunday School teachers should start the children right, by making it seem an easy, glad thing to speak about our Christian life, in meeting and out of it, as of other things in which we are interested.

Especially, let teachers correct the idea

That speaking in meeting is the chief thing in religion. The lost art of conversation can best be revived in the Sunday School class. Let us revive the art of conversation and enlist its great power for Christianity. At the very least, let us dare to stand for our principles with quiet dignity and firmness, especially when illiberal "liberals" ride roughshod over other beliefs except their own. Canon Addon told the following story, in a sermon, at St. Paul's, London: "At a small dinner party at the other end of London, the ladies had withdrawn, and under the guidance of one member of the company the conversation took a turn of which it will be enough here and now to say that it was utterly dishonorable to Jesus Christ our Lord. One of the guests said nothing, at presently asked the host's permission to ring the bell, and when the servant appeared he ordered his marriage. He then, with the courtesy of perfect self-command, expressed his regret at being obliged to retire, but explained that he was ill a Christian. Mark the phrase—it made a deep impression at the time—still a Christian. Perhaps it occurs to you that the guest who was capable of this act of simple courage must have been a bishop, or, at least, a clergyman. The party was made up entirely of laymen, and the guest in question became the great Prime Minister of the early years of the reign of Queen Victoria—he was the late Sir Robert Peel.

"Why don't Christians talk about religion more?" said a young lady to a preacher who spoke cheerily of religion at a social gathering. "No one said anything to me about religion after I became a member of a church," said another young lady, who had lost her first love through lack of Christian unsel.

Here are two stories that silent Christians could ponder, and especially young people forming the habit, through foolish fear, neglecting opportunities to speak a word in season to him that is sin-weary. Col. Patton, leader of the Covenanters, had been taken prisoner by Charles II., and doomed to execution at Edinburgh. A royalist officer, abseil, who had fought at his side in Germany, met him as he was led away as a prisoner, and said, "I'm sorry to see you here, Patton. I'll go to the King for a pardon." "It's of no use; you'll not get it." "If he does not grant it, I'll never lift my sword for him again." He applied in that spirit and got the pardon for his friend, and hastened with it to Edinburgh; but the pitiless Lords of Council did it back and let him go to the block. Another such story goes with an old tower in the Isle of Man, one of whose governors was cursed of treason and sentenced to death. Friends interceded with the King, and a pardon was obtained, but it fell into the hands of a bitter enemy, who held it back until after execution. We count those who withheld these pardons the most cruel of men, but what of us who hold back from our own households and neighbors and daily associates, the news of a pardon full and free of all their sins has been provided for them at the Cross?

Wayside witnessing is illustrated by an incident in the life of Rev. J. J. Dolliver, father of Senator J. P. Dolliver, of Iowa. Many years ago he was on a circuit in West Virginia. He was riding to his circuit one day morning, and saw, striding on before him, a tall, awkward young man carrying a ring of fish, which he had just caught. Instead of scolding him for going a-fishing on Sunday, the preacher rode beside him, and conversed with him. He talked to him about his future, and about what he was going to do of himself. He advised him to give his heart to God, become a Christian, go to school, and get an education. It was a word spoken in season. The young man was none other than Rev. T. B. Hughes, now of the Iowa Conference, and the father of Rev. H. Hughes, president-elect of De Pauw University, and Rev. M. S. Hughes, of Kansas City.

They follow the seventy most closely who bear a glad Gospel from house to house. Dr. Jewett related this interesting incident in a recent sermon: "My friend, Dr. Alexander Whyte, a little while ago was in Edinburgh. He was in the habit of asking God every morning to give him some evangel for the day that he might carry it with him among the people. One morning this evangel came to him, 'He delighteth in mercy.' He went into many homes, carrying that helpful message with him, and late in the afternoon, his visiting being done, he went into a lawyer's office to discharge a little business. The lawyer was a leading man in his profession in Edinburgh, a great lawyer, and a still greater Christian, a Christian who gives himself ungrudgingly in the service of his fellow-men. 'And,' says Dr. Whyte, 'after we had been talking a little while on church business, the great lawyer brushed his pen and paper and parcements on one side, and, looking into the face of the minister, he said, 'Have you any word for an old sinner?' Says Dr. Whyte, 'I was aghast, but after a moment's pause, I said to him, 'He delighteth in mercy,' and I left the office. Next morning on my breakfast table there lay a letter, and in that letter, which was from that lawyer, was this word, 'I will never doubt him again.'"

When two of the seventy came to a home they said, "Salute, peace be to this house"—most beautiful of national greetings. Even members of a family, with their various temperaments and differences of opinion represent war more than peace, and this lesson is a good time to talk of peace at home, and how essential to peace is true religion. Even with a Christian spirit it is hard enough for human beings to make a home of peace, but it is much harder when there is nothing to modify natural selfishness.

A celebrated bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church recently related, that he was once standing in a great railway station when many excursion trains in addition to the large number of trains sent out during rush hours were being dispatched one after another. To a man looking on from the outside, it seemed like Babel. But he noticed one man in the midst of the noise and the rush who stood there as calm and good-tempered and helpful as ever any man was seen in his library, and yet he was the man at the head, to whom everyone was coming with questions. The bishop watched him for a little while, and finally went up to him, and said, "My friend, how can you do it?" And the man replied: "Why, sir, you ought to know—the grace of God."

That is the secret of peace for parents and children amid the troublous hours that come at times to every home.

Why do we worry about the nest?

We only stay for a day,
Or a month, or a year, at the Lord's behest,
In this habitat of clay.

Why do we worry about the road,

With its bill or deep ravine?
In a dismal path or a heavy load,
We are helped by hands unseen.

—MRS. SARAH K. BOLTON.

"From house to house" meant from boat to boat to a lay missionary among the sailors. A skipper who had lost his place because he would not fish on Sunday, and was placed on a small smack by Christian friends in London, charged to show that he could catch as much in six days as others did in seven, and do Christian missionary work as herald of Christ besides. When he arrived among the fishing smacks, knowing his mission, four of them came on board to rail at him. "Not this 'ere cant, but more whiskey is what we wants." Nothing daunted, he brought out steaming cups of tea, and laid out four warm mufflers. "What do they cost?" said the visitors. "I'll give 'em to ye on one condition." "What's that?" "That you'll admit there's love in them, for the Christian ladies that knit them loved you for Christ's sake, though they never seed you." "That's right," said the visitors, as they received the mufflers and wrapped them about them to shut out the cold. "Ow much more must Jesus 'ave loved yer, who died for yer." That was his first sermon, and it was effective, though brief, for three of the four returned that wonderful love.

We ought to repeat literally the work of the seventy, as it was done in one Y. M. C. A. convention, for example, where one evening, instead of devoting an hour and a half to a prayer meeting it was cut down to an intense half hour, and the hour, from 8 to 9, was devoted to visitation of stores, two by two, to bring men to another meeting at 9, which was wonderfully fruitful in saved souls.

The American Girl Pictures—FREE

THESE charming pictures (5 in the complete series) of the loveliest types of the American girl, we are giving away to introduce our brand of PURE BORAX. These are pictures of rare character and artistic merit and have been issued in a handsome form for framing. They will make a charming addition to any home, and every one who is a lover of pictures will be delighted to possess them. The small illustration only gives a hint of the real beauty of the full-size pictures.

To those who will send us a box top (and four cents in stamps to cover cost of mailing) from a package of "20 MULE-TEAM BORAX"—which may be bought at any grocery or drug store—we will send, carefully packed, a fine, large reproduction, size 14 x 19, on heavy plate paper, for framing. Ask for head No. 2, and address "Dept. A., Pacific Coast Borax Co., New York City."

BORAX—A Household Necessity

After you have used the first box of BORAX, you will wonder how you ever got along without it. If you will bathe your face every night in warm BORAX water, you will soon notice the difference in the clearness of your complexion and the smoothness of your skin. A little BORAX in the water makes the bath really cleansing—puts the pores of the body in a natural and healthy condition. The secret of the wonderful power of BORAX lies in a very simple law—IT SOFTENS WATER. You will be astonished to see how much easier, and quicker, and better you can wash things—in the laundry, in house cleaning—by adding a little BORAX to the water. But be careful to get Pure Borax. Ask for "20 MULE-TEAM BRAND." It's Pure.

THE MEN'S EVANGELIST

THE Young Men's Christian Association had much to do with the development of the greatest modern evangelist, Dwight L. Moody. He met Ira D. Sankey at a Convention of the Associations, and it was there that their partnership was begun. Yet, strange to say, Mr. Moody advocated the holding of immense mass-meetings for men and women, and the Chicago Association, under his leadership, erected its first big building around Farewell Hall, as the centre of this evangelistic effort. As the work of the Associations became more specialized, Mr. Moody was a favorite speaker at immense meetings for men only. J. Wilbur Chapman and L. W. Munhall have also been favorites for such services at Conventions; but it has remained for Fred. B. Smith to devote his whole life to such work, and to achieve such large success in it as to attract widespread interest, and to lead to numerous requests from other countries that he spend some time with their Associations, preaching the Gospel of men.

Mr. Smith is a Westerner, born on a farm in Iowa, December 24, 1865. At the age of sixteen, he left home to attend the Grammar School at Muscatine, Ia., and after spending parts of five years there, he became a student at the State University in Iowa City. His brother having moved to South Dakota, he followed him in 1883 to his ranch in Charles Mix County, thirty-five miles from a railroad, where he taught school part of the time, and finally became a traveling salesman for a binding company. His conversion occurred while he was on the road. He had become interested in the Young Men's Christian Association at Burlington, Ia., and a group of men there had agreed to pray for his salvation.

Just about this time he attended a Salvation Army meeting and heard them sing, "Redeemed by the blood of the Lamb, I am." It moved his heart, which was more than usually tender, owing to the serious illness of his mother, who was a fine-grained daughter of Virginia, sensitive, affectionate and idolized by her children. On Nov. 14, 1886, Smith finally gave up his life to Christ. From the beginning of his Christian life, he felt drawn to Christian work. Rev. H. D. Wiard, then the Superintendent of Home Missions for the Congregationalists in South Dakota, was his adviser, and upon his recommendation, Smith became the General Secretary of the Association at Sioux Falls, where he labored for four years. He was Assistant State Secretary of Wisconsin for a year. He then went to Dubuque, Ia., as General Secretary, where he first showed capacity for the organization of big meetings for men. During the winter of 1896 and 1897, more than a hundred men were led to Christ. The possibilities of an aggressive evangelistic work for men and of his relation to it did not, however, fully dawn upon him until the opening of the Spanish War, when he volunteered to go with the troops to Chickamauga. The great tent meetings, with hundreds of conversions among the soldier boys, led Smith to decide that he would devote his life to the evangelization of men.

A MAN AMONG MEN

He is particularly well fitted for such an undertaking; being full of physical energy, and manly in appearance, he impresses men as being himself pre-eminently masculine. His shoulders are broad, his head set squarely upon them; his frame large, but not bulky; his posture indicative of poise and confidence. His face is strong, and would compel attention in any crowd of men. His eyes are rather deep set, but full of sympathy, ready to fill with tears or sparkle with humor. His voice is penetrating and full, with a resonance that reaches the remotest corner of largest halls.

Like all other successful evangelists, he is master of his meeting. He never loses his grip of the crowd, from the time the meeting begins until the close, and frequently the meeting lasts for two full hours. His address is usually about forty-five minutes in length. It is simple and direct. He deals with such sins as impurity, gambling, drunkenness and unbelief with the utmost plainness of speech. Now and then a pointed story, sometimes a bit of humor to relieve the tension; but ever a continuous appeal to all that is best in manhood. During the past year he has visited 259 different associations, conducted 380 evangelistic meetings at which 146,232 men have been present, and 8,641 men definitely professed to take Christ as their Saviour. The organization of the personal workers is carefully looked after, and in this way every inquirer gets such counsel as he may particularly need. I recently asked Mr. Smith for some incidents of his work, and among those he gave me were the following:

A GOSPEL MEETING WILL BEAT A PRIZE FIGHT

"Some years ago I arrived in Texas, at a small town where I was to conduct a men's meeting at night in the hall, and the first thing that met my eye, was that the little town was just pasted all over with an advertisement for a prize fight that night, at which the admission was to be twenty-five cents. The Secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association told me that he thought it had been gotten up in an attempt to defeat our meeting. The town was practically all a railroad men's town, and it seemed as though our meeting was doomed. But the secretary in charge of the advertising was a brave fellow, and he only went at it the harder. The hour came for the meeting, and the men streamed in until they filled practically every seat in the hall. Just about as I was to get up to speak, the secretary leaned over and whispered to me and said, 'There comes in the fellow that was running the prize fight.' And sure enough, the advertising for the Gospel meeting had been done so earnestly and persistently that we had the men of the town. The two thugs who were belligerent and threatening to fight, waited awhile for their crowd, and finally abandoned it and came over to attend the Gospel meeting."

AN OLD-TIME CONVICTION

"On the 7th of February this year, I addressed a meeting in Lincoln, Neb., and, in the audience, there was a cashier of a bank from a neighboring city. He stayed through the meeting, but did not manifest any interest at all, but went out, with a deep conviction gripping him that his life was wrong. He told of how he tried to get rid of it all that afternoon and night, but it stayed with him. Next morning, he started for Chicago on business, but all day long, as he rode on the train, the memory of the meeting kept intensifying with him, until at last he got off the train, stopped his journey, took the next train back to Nebraska, and went to his home; told his wife of the desperate struggle he was having, and they together in their parlor knelt and prayed. He gave his heart to God, boarded the next train, and went to Chicago on his business errand, rejoicing in the salvation of Jesus Christ, and is giving now the most thrilling testimonies of the power and peace of the Christian life."

Mr. Smith is soon to make an extended tour of the principal cities of India, and it is expected that the meetings will from the beginning attract widespread attention.

Gave the Court a New Bible

Mr. Alonzo Keys, of South Orange, N. J., sends to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD an account of an interesting incident in the work of the Baptist Young People's Union in that locality. The Bible which had long been in use in the Orange Police Court having become worn out, a new Bible was presented to the court by the B. Y. P. U. of the North Orange Baptist Church. For the past twenty-five years a Bible has been used, which was presented by Rev. Hugh P. Fleming, rector of St. John's Church. "It has lost its covers, and some of the pages are missing. After its long service, it reposes on a shelf in the courtroom. Recently the B. Y. P. U. has been studying conditions in the courts, as shown by the arraignment of prisoners, and it was while visiting the Orange court that the Union's committee observed that the Bible in use was in a dilapidated condition."

Oklahoma's Revival Wave

DURING the last three months, a considerable section of Oklahoma has been swept by a tidal wave of revival. It is a genuine visitation of the "old-fashioned religion," that stirs the souls of men and women to their lowest depths, by convicting them of sin and pointing them to the Cross, for pardon and peace. In Perkins, Okla., the local churches united in forwarding the revival work, which was conducted by

PROF. W. E. OLIVER

Rev. French E. Oliver, and his brother, Prof. W. R. Oliver. A large tabernacle was built, which was crowded at every meeting.

At Guthrie, the evangelists had a comparatively short season, yet wonderful results were accomplished.

Pastors C. J. Howes, First M. E. Church; C. H. McDermond, West Guthrie M. E. Church; T. L. Rippey, M. E. Church, South; W. C. Miles, First Presbyterian; I. C. Rankin, United Presbyterian; J. C. Dazey, West Guthrie Congregational; and W. S. Cooke, First Baptist Church, are united in publicly declaring the work to be thorough, orthodox and far-reaching.

in length, and was filled to overflowing at every meeting. One of the most attractive features of the services was the Gospel of Song under Prof. Oliver's leadership, he having a well-trained choir of 200 voices at the meetings.

Special tabernacles were erected in different places — including Kingfisher, Perkins, Guthrie and Stillwater — to which the revival spread. In these places together, it is claimed that some 1,700 have confessed Christ. Stillwater alone reporting 460, with "a general toning up of the moral atmosphere." Shawnee, Pond Creek, South McAllister and Perry are now arranging for the coming of the evangelists.

In Stillwater, the revival wrought a spiritual revolution in the Agricultural and Mechanical College, where large numbers of the students declared publicly for the Christian life.

Concerning the methods adopted in this latest revival, it is worth noting that it is

REV. FRENCH E. OLIVER

A TABERNACLE MEETING IN SHAWNEE, OKLA.

Our photograph shows a part of the interior of the large tabernacle during a service. This structure was of boards, covered with tarred paper and lined. It was eighty feet wide by one hundred feet wholly free from sensationalism. People are not driven from the meetings by boorish ways or startling peculiarities for effect. The truth is presented in a plain, straightforward manner, with no catches to trap the unwary into commitment of themselves to the all-important question. The business men of the churches take care of the finances.

Northern Illinois Shaken by a Revival

ONE of the most remarkable religious meetings that has ever been held in northern Illinois has just been conducted under the leadership of Rev. William A. Sunday, of Chicago, assisted by Prof. Fred. Fisher, an evangelistic singer. The pastors of the churches in Sterling and Rock Falls united in the effort, and built a tabernacle that would seat three thousand people, and for nearly five weeks the immense building was filled with eager and interested people. Over 1,650 persons confessed Christ and resolved to live a Christian life. The cost in money for the five weeks' campaign was about $2,200, which was easily raised in the offerings taken at the meetings. From every walk of life the converts came. Business in the city was practically suspended. Saloons stopped serving free lunch, and excursion trains brought in hundreds to enjoy and to be blessed in the services. The evangelist has no stipulated salary for his services. On the last Sabbath he receives the free-will offering of the people. The free-will offering in the present case was over $3,200, and so freely was it given, that had not the evangelist called a halt, it would have been much greater.

At Carthage, Ill., in October last, over 500, and at Jefferson, Iowa, in December, over 500; and at Marshall, Minn., in January, over 600, were the results of the work of this man of God. He is now at work in Galva, Ill., and when done there will go to Rockford, Ill., for a month. Rev. Mr. Sunday for a number of years played baseball with a Chicago club. While a player he was converted in a mission in Chicago.

THE "PARSON"

A STORY OF THE SLUMS

By ISADORE BERNSTEIN

"HEY, fellers, de Parson's dyin'!"
"Who tol' yer?"
"I seen it on de papers dey's puttin' on de door of de Mission. Ol' man Thomson—de bloke what helps de Parson—comes out an' pastes dem up."

The news that the beloved Parson of the Bowman Street Mission lay dying, was soon carried from Bowman street south to the river, and from Fuller street as far west as Jackson Square; in which district, every man, woman and child knew and loved him. The news of his condition had the effect of sending a steady stream of women, children, and not a few men, in the direction of Bowman street, between Fuller and Main streets.

The block where the crowd had gathered presented a strange appearance. Here and there were groups of women and children in earnest conversation. Many were in tears. At each end of the block, were several men, pleading with the drivers of vehicles passing through there, not to do so, as "the Parson was dying, and the noise would disturb him."

Bowman street had experienced a vast change. The block that had been famous for many years as the "Block of Joins" was no more. The change had not come at once. One by one the small brick dwellings disappeared, and with them the "joins," and in their place rose gigantic tenements. One gambling hell, famous among the denizens as "The Palace," remained to the very last; but, eventually, the gamblers left, and the place became vacant. For five years the little building remained empty. One day a young man, too well-dressed to belong to the neighborhood, walked up the stoop, and unlocking the door, which creaked as he pushed it open with some force, disappeared within.

The news soon spread that "The Palace" had a tenant at last. The following day a load of lumber was dumped before the house, and with it came several workmen with carpenter's kits upon their shoulders. For several days the sound of hammer and saw never ceased, and speculation became rife as to the tenant.

On the following Sunday morning, while Bowman street was yet abed, the young man who had entered the house two weeks ago, reappeared with two large paper signs under his arm. After glancing about, he tacked them on the blank space between the two windows of the first floor. The upper and larger sign read:

BOWMAN STREET MISSION
ALL WELCOME

And the lower one:

SERVICE EVERY AFTERNOON AND EVENING

Afternoon saw the front door wide open, and one by one a number of the people of the surrounding streets, after surveying the signs for some time, entered. All came with some object in view—some to see the interior of the mysterious house; others—the older men—came "to see how de worst joint on de street could be changed into a mission;" and not a few to see the daring man who would begin such a work in that neighborhood.

The first floor, formerly two rooms, had been turned into a large assembly room, with a platform, several chairs and benches, a table, and a small organ. Upon the platform, welcoming the visitors as they entered, stood a well built young man of twenty-six. He had the sensitive, studious face of one who had suffered. At one moment his eyes were smiling or pleading as he welcomed his guests; the next instant he would quiet a noisy visitor with a swift glance of command, which was not to be misinterpreted.

For five years, from eight A.M. to ten P.M., the Mission was open, and all who came were welcomed. During these years no stranger had ever appeared at the Mission, and the Parson, as he was generally known, with the help of his first convert—a man who had been an habitual drunkard, and whom the Parson had saved from a beating at the hands of a saloon crowd—did all the work necessary about the little building. It had not been an easy matter to convince the rough people of that quarter that the Mission was there for their benefit. The young man had a difficult task the first few years in subduing the rowdies of the neighborhood, who, at the instigation of the saloon-keepers, would menace all who entered, and try to disturb and break up the meetings. His kindness, patience, and courage gradually became known, and they who had begun by respecting, ended by loving him. He knew almost every family in the district, and to spend an evening with the Parson, and become a member of his gymnasium, Bowling Club, Girls' Reading Club, or Bible Society, became the highest ambition of all. He had organized a choir of boys and girls, whose sweet voices could be heard every Sunday morning singing the hymns of salvation. He would visit the people at all hours. No home was too dirty for him to enter, when called for, or if he knew that the people were in need. When sickness appeared he would be summoned even before the doctor; when a family lacked coal during the freezing winter days, or ice in the hot summer, the Parson was notified, and would somehow contrive to supply their wants.

One cold winter night, long after midnight, he was returning from his tour around the district looking for homeless wanderers, when, within a few blocks of the Mission, a man darted out of a tenement, and on seeing him gasped: "Fire! Parson. The whole back of the house is on fire! Where's the alarm box?"

Pointing to the corner, the Parson dashed into the tenement, which by this time was alive with a struggling mass of humanity. To get up the stairs while this maddened throng came rushing down, was impossible, and quickly running to the front of the building, where the fire escapes were, he found them also full. Men were trampling women and children under their feet as they tried to climb down the frail iron ladder. The Parson, unable to reach them, raised his voice, and making a trumpet of his hands, called out: "Take your time, friends, don't rush; the firemen are coming. Men, don't crowd the women and children; let them come first. Here you, Denny," (to a man on the second-floor fire escape), "throw those little ones down. We'll catch them."

A score of men had surrounded the Parson, and all raised their hands, as one by one the little tots were thrown to them and caught safely.

The fire companies had arrived by this time, and quickly raising their long ladders, safely brought down all who were on the fire-escapes. While the firemen were fighting the flames, which were coming from every window above the second floor, the Parson turned his attention to those who had been saved from a fiery death.

Mrs. Hogan, one of the tenants who had been living on the second floor of the doomed building, seeing the Parson, sprang to his side, caught him by both arms, and cried:

"Oh, Parson, Willie has been left on the bed. Save him! Won't you save him?"

He could not resist the heartrending cry, and he sprang through the smoke and disappeared. A cry of horror went up from the crowd of spectators and firemen. The chief, with several men, tried to follow him, but were forced back by the smoke. A cry—a single cry from the crowd—caused every one to look up at a window on the second floor. There stood the Parson with Willie Hogan, a crippled boy of ten, in his arms.

"Shove your ladder over to that window! Quick, men!" cried the chief.

The ladder was raised, and the chief, followed by several of his men, ran up. Below they had reached the window, a cry of horror from the crowd caused them to look up. The Parson with his burden had disappeared.

They found him, as they entered the window, close to the wall, with the child clasped tightly in his arms, and his own coat wrapped around the little cripple's head. When they brought him down, the greatest excitement ever known in Bowman street followed. The people rushed forward to aid the brave rescuer; but the firemen, with the aid of the police, carried him to the Mission, and a physician was immediately called. The Parson had been severely burned, and had inhaled both smoke and flame. His condition was serious.

Week after week, the report was the same—"He was very ill." Women of the neighborhood vied with one another in bringing him flowers and delicacies, and many of them pawned their wedding-rings, to buy these tokens of their love. "Ol' Man Thomson," his first convert, preached every Sunday, and during the long illness the Mission was kept open and running.

One Sunday, while Thomson, the convert, was preaching, the Parson entered the assembly-room, and slowly walked to the platform. A cry of pity went up from the little congregation.

The Parson's body was weak, and bent as with age; his face was colorless, his cheeks hollow, but his eyes—those wonderful eyes—remained the same. He remained with them a short time—long enough to hear the choir sing his favorite hymn: "Nearer, My God, to Thee." His lips were seen to move as though in prayer, but no sound escaped them.

He had to be carried back to his room. The following day every one knew he was dying.

In the large assembly-room, the choir was waiting. Ol' man Thomson had called them. "The Parson wants you all at the Mission," he said. "He wants to see you before he goes."

They had been waiting about ten minutes, when a messenger came down from the upper room. They followed him upstairs, to the chamber where the Parson lay. Beside him stood Thomson and the doctor. The latter placed his hand under the dying man's shoulder, and raised him in that position. He motioned the children to come nearer.

"My dear children," said the Parson, faintly, "I am about to leave you. I am going to my Father in heaven." He closed his eyes, and those close to him heard him pray. "Oh God! Have pity on these little ones; save them from the temptation which surrounds them. I have given my life cheerfully for them, and when I am gone they will be left alone. Teach them and guide them, that they may walk in the paths of righteousness."

His eyes closed, and the doctor gently laid him back on the pillow. A moment later the Parson's pure spirit had passed from earth to heaven.

With tears rolling down their cheeks the children sang his favorite hymn, and then separated.

A good man's work never dies. The Bowman Street Mission lived and flourished, and many a poor, sin-sick soul has found there peace and forgiveness. The spirit of its founder animates the Mission and inspires its work.

Henry Y. VanDoren, died recently at Center-ville, N. J., aged sixty-five years. He was widely known and highly respected.

Rev. J. C. Forbes, passed away lately at Austin, Ark., in his eighty-sixth year. He was a pioneer preacher; faithful and zealous, and was highly esteemed.

Mrs. Robert Henderson passed away lately at her home, Watertown, S. Dak., in her seventy-eighth year. She had been a constant reader of this paper for many years.

Mrs. Sarah Dixon, of West Newbury, passed away lately. She had been a "shut-in" for several years and was an appreciative reader of this paper. Her life was one of patient suffering and firm faith in Christ as her Saviour.

Mrs. Isabella Marsh, of Chico, Calif., long a devoted Christian and a reader of this journal, died suddenly at the home of her brother, W. H. Campbell. The last night of her life she spent in planning some charitable work.

William F. Compher, of Lovettsville, Va., died recently at the age of eighty years. He held many positions in the county, and was highly esteemed by all who knew him. He was for many years a popular school-teacher. He was a consistent Christian, and had been a reader of this paper for over twenty years.

Caleb H. Howell, who died recently at his home in Flanders, N. J., was a descendant of a very patriotic ancestry. Col. Jacob Drake, a hero of the Revolutionary War; Col. N. Horton, of the same conflict, and Capt. Samuel Howell. Mr. Howell served over four years in the Civil War as a private, in Company D, Forty-eighth Regiment New York State Volunteer Infantry, the famous "Die-No-Mores," who received their name from singing the hymn, "We are going home to die no more," as they went into battle. Mr. Howell had held a number of prominent offices, and as postmaster built the first post-office in Flanders.

The People, the Land, and the Book

From REV. DAVID GREGG, D.D., late successor to REV. THEODORE A. CYLER, D.D., Brooklyn.

I have taken this magazine, "The People, the Land and the Book," from the very start, and I have found each number up to the mark both in scholarship and in loyalty to the truth. I should like to see it in every Jewish and Christian home. It would help in the enthronement of the true Messiah, and in the establishment of the Kingdom of God on earth. It enables one to read God's Book through enlightened Jewish eyes. I ask for it the blessing of our Covenant God.

From REV. E. P. INGERSOLL, D.D., Secretary of the American Bible Society.

In my judgment, this publication is a remarkable one, admirably adapted to the double purpose for which it is intended, namely, to present to the Jew a correct idea of Christianity, and to the Christian much-needed information regarding that wonderful people, the Jews. I am confident any assistance you may give him in the way of subscriptions to his publications will be well bestowed and heartily appreciated.

From the "SABBATH RECORDER."

A knowledge of the People and the Land is needful to the comprehension of the Book. This magazine appears to be admirably edited, and that by a Jewish disciple of Christ of long standing. Mr. Schapiro is well qualified by birth and education to conduct this magazine. . . . A periodical devoted to such aims ought to be successful and certainly will be useful.

From the "PHILADELPHIA METHODIST."

It was highly commended at Ocean Grove Summer School of Theology. The best Hebrew-Christian authorities and writers in Europe contribute to its pages. Subscribers will receive a unique and valuable premium in the form of the entire Pentateuch, in Hebrew, neatly enrolled after the manner of the ancient Jewish law. This itself is worth more than a year's cost.

The only Illustrated Magazine in the world devoted exclusively to the Hebrew Race. Don't miss this great opportunity—subscribe to-day.

SAPOLIO

EDUCATION IN MISSIONS*

Heathen Won to Christ by Seeing Christ in the Missionary's Life

LIGHT, as an emblem of spiritual truth, was frequently employed by our Lord. Not only was he the light of the world, but his followers were to be the light of the world. He told his disciples explicitly that he constituted them the light of the world (Matt. 5: 14), and charged them that they should let their light so shine, that people should be led to glorify God. He depended on them, after he should be taken away, to enlighten the world. They were to so live that men should see him in them, and so seeing, should admire and love and worship him.

Perhaps we have not sufficiently realized how much of the triumph of missions is due to the faithfulness with which the missionary has obeyed this command. In heathen lands, as in our own, preaching has been the chief means of winning converts; but there, in every case, the beginning has been the attraction of a life full of Christ's spirit. The men who went out to proclaim Christ, must have had his spirit of self-sacrifice and yearning for souls, to take them out at the beginning, and the same spirit manifesting itself in their manner and conduct, won the confidence and respect of the heathen first of all to themselves, and afterwards to Him who had made them what they were. The heathen could not see or understand Christ, but they could appreciate the goodness of the missionary's life, which they could see, and then their education began by the missionary teaching them whence the goodness that they admired was derived.

In a modern story, an earnest worker is represented as taking up his abode in a great city among workmen, who were prejudiced against religion and boasted of being atheists. He formed clubs, visited them in their homes, saying nothing about religion, but always declaring himself a Christian. He became their friend, leading them to better lives, helping them to make their homes brighter, persuading them to quit drinking, to take an interest in clean pleasures, and so charming them into purer, better ways of thought. They grew to love him passionately, to depend on him in trouble, and to look to him for counsel in every difficulty. At last, when he preached Christ plainly, one of them voiced the feeling of the others when he said, "I can believe in God now, for I have seen God in you."

Work for Christ in Africa*

The Missionary's Pioneer Work in Africa Degraded by Greed and Avarice

HOW gradually during the past half century the map of Africa has filled up! It is not long since a fringe of towns around the coast of the continent constituted all that was known of it and a great blank was a confession of ignorance of the interior. Robert Moffatt and David Livingstone were pioneers and made its wonders known to the World. Well would it have been for the people of the vast continent, if the further knowledge and development of the land had come from the travels of men of their spirit. But the greed of the trader, the avarice of the gold-seeker, the ambition of statesmen, took up the task of exploration. Stanley's description of "Darkest Africa" stirred the worst passions of civilized Europe. Men went there in hordes, not to redeem the people, but to make profit for themselves. The people were despoiled of their lands, and then the so-called "Christian" Governments stepped in and divided the whole into "spheres of influence," which, in many cases, have proved the subjection and practical enslavement of great populations.

The missionary's work in Africa has been a blessing; but the work of the missionary's government, and that of the traders of his race, have too often proved a curse. The one, has to a great extent, neutralized the other, so that we have not been permitted to see "what Christ could do for Darkest Africa." It is true that a multitude of great and good men have gone there and worked for Christ, laying down their lives for the people, and we have seen how rich has been the harvest from their labors; but they have been hindered in their service, not so much by heathenism, as by the rum sent from their own lands, and by the sickening cruelties practised on the natives, by men of the missionary's race. We had a glimmer of the dawn of a beautiful day, in which it seemed that the Sun of Righteousness was about to drive away the darkness; but the sky became overcast by the iniquity of men, and we have yet to wait for the proof of what Christ can do for Africa.

Fanny Crosby is 84

A GATHERING in honor of the eighty-fourth birthday of the world's greatest living hymn writer, Fanny Crosby, was held at the musical studio of the Biglow & Main Co., New York, lately. Fanny was the recipient of many tokens of friendship and congratulations. Among a number of poems and letters sent to her were some beautiful verses by Miss E. E. Hewitt, of Philadelphia, entitled "The Love Wreath," the closing stanza of which runs thus:

So we'll gather around our "Fanny,"
With smiles and greetings sincere;
May she have just the sweetest birthday,
She has had for many a year;
Then we'll all be happy with her,
And thank the dear Lord above,
For sending us one of his angels

Messengers Appointed to Prepare Christ's Way

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

It is significant that "when the time was come that Jesus should be received up" (Luke 9: 51), for the cross, the tomb, and the resurrection all led on to his ascension, and his position at the right hand of God, he "sent messengers before his face." Why not his chosen twelve? When his disciples, James and John, saw that these messengers had not succeeded in their errand to a village of the Samaritans, they sought to assert themselves, and desired to call down fire from heaven to consume those who would not receive Jesus. But they only met with rebuke for a zeal which was not in the spirit of their Lord.

It was after these things that the Lord "appointed other seventy also"; who, however, are never heard of afterwards, and are never spoken of in the same way as the twelve, and yet they were sent forth under very similar conditions. The people of Israel had always their elders, twelve in number, the head men of every tribe, but besides them there were "seventy elders" twice named, and chosen in a time of emergency (Exod. 24: 1, 9; Num. 11: 16). The Lord's time on earth was growing short—He would make the most of it. Only Luke tells us of the seventy, and the object of their appointment was that during the journey up to Jerusalem they should go before his face into every village and city which he should pass through, to announce his coming. They were to go forth two and two, and their first duty was to pray. The Lord repeats to them what he had said to the twelve before he sent them forth: "The harvest truly is plentiful, but the laborers are few; pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest that he would send forth laborers into his harvest."

Prayer is ever the first necessity of an apostle, an evangelist, or a pastor. When the twelve apostles began to be conscious that they were doing too much personally, and they called on the multitude of the disciples to choose from among themselves seven men who might help in the more secular affairs of the Church, they said, "But we will give ourselves continually to prayer and the ministry of the Word." First prayer, then preaching. A sermon, unprepared by prayer, neither glorifies God nor helps man, and so with every other kind of Christian work. All work which is not prepared by prayer is like a stagnant pool—it exhales the corruption of the human. Work, however feeble and wanting, which is the outcome of communion with God, cannot but bless.

In order to become true messengers of God, we need to take his view of the harvest. He tells us, whatever we may think about it, that the harvest truly is great; the lack is of laborers to gather it in. The moment a laborer thinks himself important, as the disciples did when they sought to solve the problem which of them was the greatest, he is spoiled for the harvest field, until he has learned his nothingness. It is when a man says, "Who is sufficient for these things?" and in his conscious nothingness, he hides himself under the shadow of the Almighty, and says, "O Lord, in mercy send more laborers!" that God can make him the means of saving such souls out of whom he can make the true laborers in his harvest-field. A self-important evangelist begets spiritual children like himself, who are not little enough to leave room for God to use them in doing mighty things.

The next necessity for a God-sent messenger is to have the true spirit of Christ manifest in word and deed. "Behold, I send you forth as lambs among wolves." Here again the same thing is spoken to the seventy as to the twelve (comp. Matt. 10: 16; Luke 10: 3). He who would yet be manifest as the "sheep before her shearer" which "openeth not her mouth," (Isa. 53: 7), who, when before three tribunals, would answer not a word, must have witnesses which would "endure grief, suffering wrongfully" (1. Pet. 2: 19); such as would overcome, not by calling down fire out of heaven, but by the blood and character of the Lamb.

J. D., South Norwalk, Conn. Has the new Panama Republic adopted a Constitution?

Yes, some time ago. It is framed largely after our own Constitution. The citizens of the new republic are officially called "Panamenians," foreigners of more than ten years' residence can become naturalized at once; foreigners whose wives and families reside in Panama are eligible in six years; and if the wife be a Panamenian, the husband may become a citizen in three years. Slavery is prohibited; equality of all before the law is declared, and the right of assembly for citizens is announced. Imprisonment for debt is abolished; freedom of religious worship is established, although the Catholic Church is recognized as "the religion of the majority," and therefore entitled to consideration; but no minister of any religious creed is to be allowed to occupy a public office "unless that office be identified with the Church or public instruction."

"Friend in need" Am I justified in praying to be delivered from a person who has caused me much unhappiness?

You are justified, and are invited to take all your troubles to God in prayer. It is the wisest thing you can do and the surest way of getting help. There should, however, be nothing vindictive in your prayer, nor any desire in your heart for the punishment of that person. It is sufficient that you tell God of your sorrow, and your apprehension of the evil, that, as you say, seems to be impending, and ask his protection. Commit your case, wholly and unreservedly to him, leaving to him the manner and method of deliverance, only asking that he save you from the calamity and preserve you from all evil. Then go your way with the conviction that "no weapon formed against you can prosper." In his own good time and way he will deliver you.

J. E. F., McHenry, Miss. What did Christ mean by telling his disciples (Matt. 7: 6) not to cast their pearls before swine?

The direction is on the same principle as in that other command (Matt. 10: 23) that when they were persecuted in one city they were to go to another. When their message was deliberately and persistently rejected they were not to continue pressing it upon unwilling hearers, but to turn to those who would listen. It was a waste of time and effort to persist in preaching to people who had manifested their opposition to it.

Mr. Joseph Ratliff of Lyons, Kan., writes to THE MAIL BAG, that a Kansas State Peace Society has been formed, in which thirty cities and towns are now represented. It has received the cordial endorsement of the South-west M. E. Conference.

W. M. L., Conrad, Ia., writes:

Answering "V. B." Horton, Kan., Washington's Farewell Address is found in full in the book American Patriotism, compiled by Selim H. Peabody, Ph.D., published by the American Book Exchange, Tribune Building, New York.

M. B. C., New York. Whether the report that King Edward is seeking to end the war between Russia and Japan be true or not, it speaks well for his character and love of peace. The most noteworthy feature of his reign, is the courteous and fraternal attention he has shown to other sovereigns and powers. One has carefully to search the records of past history, to find any parallel to the present period, in the direction of grave international problems, and delicate diplomatic situations. Europe has been on the verge of war several times since King Edward began his reign—not merely in politics, but in the unadjusted and unsettled questions which might easily precipitate the nations into a terrible war. To add to the gravity of the situation, there are few statesmen of first rank in the world to-day. International problems are pressing for solution, and no men of great and commanding ability are found to handle the delicate cords that bind nations together. It would seem as if to the wisdom of King Edward, may be attributed the fact, that, in a measure, the peace of the world has been preserved in times of anxiety, and that other Powers have not been involved in the Russo-Japanese imbroglio. What profound political wisdom and accurate insight he showed in the memorable visits to foreign Powers. Beginning at Lisbon and continuing at Rome, he finished a remarkable tour at Paris. The work of reconciliation was advanced, when President Loubet of the French Republic returned King Edward's visit, and learned how sincere is the British desire for mutual better knowledge and closer friendship. The result of it all, was the Treaty which provides for the peaceable settlement of various points of difference in the policies of the two great countries. Edward, the name of Peace Maker, and he is steadily winning it.

A Los Angeles reader sends this to THE MAIL-BAG.

At the last Baptist Ministers' meeting, Rev. Dr. George Thomas Dowling, who himself several years ago left that denomination, and now is the rector of Christ Episcopal Church in this city, had just finished reading a paper on "Modern Progress in Theological Thought." Among those present was the venerable Rev. Dr. Cooke, of Boston. Dr. Cooke was commenting on the paper which had been read, and said: "Of course, there has been progress, as Dr. Dowling has affirmed. Why, it would have been unheard of fifty years ago for a minister to leave the Baptist denomination and become an Episcopalian, and then to be invited to address a Baptist Ministers' meeting." The fact is, the obligation. The objection to the eating of food denominated "unclean" in the Mosaic law must rest, therefore, if anywhere, on sanitary grounds.

Theo. J. Stewart, Lynden, Ont., Can., writes:

In the "Mail Bag" I see an inquiry about some lines concerning, "Could I with ink the ocean fill," etc. I do not know who the writer was, but I have read, or heard somewhere, the following lines:

Could I with ink the ocean fill,
And were the heavens of parchment made,
Were every stalk on earth a quill,
And every man a scribe by trade,
To write the love of God above
Would drain that ocean dry,
Nor could the scroll contain the whole,
Though spread o'er all the sky.

J. W. B., Providence, R. I., writes: "It is claimed that the author was a prisoner, and that these lines were found written on the wall of his cell." Other readers have sent similar answers.

H. J. O., Orange, Mass., writes:

I read in your paper of John Spencer's seedless case that the name has been used without knowledge or consent. We have known such cases.

H. W., Golconda, Ill. How many religions are there in the world? How many adherents to each? How much do their churches and temples cost?

The Journal of Statistical Information classifies them into nine: Christianity, with 47,000,000 followers; Confucianism, 256,000,000; Hinduism, 190,000,000; Mohammedanism, 17,000,000; Buddhism, 148,000,000; Taoism, 4,000,000; Shintoism, 14,000,000; Judaism, 9,000,000; miscellaneous, chiefly Polytheism, 118,000,000. We have seen no estimate of the cost of the edifices.

S. S. W., Norway, S. C. 1. Has the opinion learned divines as to the state of future punishment, been modified in recent years? 2. They believe in an eternal burning hell? 3. There any foundation for the belief that there are degrees of punishment?

1. We do not know their opinions, but definite and circumstantial statements formerly made in sermons, are not so common now. There is a tendency to attract men to Christ, rather than to alarm them. The expressions which Christ himself used in describing the condition of those who die impenitent, are too explicit to admit of important modification. 2. Probably few do, in view of the fact that the soul would not be affected as the body would be, by material fire. Mental suffering, however, may be more acute than physical. 3. Christ's reference (Luke 47: 48) to some who would be beaten with many stripes, and others who would be beaten with few, is the only foundation we know brethren, I have sometimes thought that if I myself were ever to leave the Baptist faith, I would go into the Episcopal fold. I am too old to do it now, but— Here the meeting was thrown into an uproar of merriment when Dr. Dowling cried out, "Come on, Brother, come on!"

A. M., Chillicothe, O. How many strikes occurred in New York City during 1903?

According to the official report of the Commission of Labor, there were 192 labor disputes of all kinds, including strikes and lockouts. Fifty-nine were in the building and forty-eight in the metal and machinery industries.

J. E. S. Oelwein, Ia. Does the Biblical prohibition of pork as food still remain in force?

The Jews still obey it, but that with the other dietary laws, which forbade the eating of oysters and other articles of food, was not made obligatory on Gentile Christians. It grew in 1903 two barrels of sound, large apples. There are buds so the apple forms back of the bud, and never a blossom on the tree.

Inquirer, Worcester, Mass. Is there any truth in the statement that our nursery legends have an ancient religious origin?

Some of them have such an origin. One of the most remarkable is, "The house that Jack built." The Jewish Passover Service Book has a parable on which it is probably based. It tells of, "The fire that burned the staff, that beat the dog, that bit the cat, that ate the kid," etc. It explains that the fire refers to Rome, which overthrew Greece, which defeated Persia, which conquered Babylon, which carried the Jews into captivity.

D. E. G., Elmhurst, Pa. Do you think it right that a preacher of the Gospel should permit his good name in advertising whiskey?

No, certainly not. But it is very likely the

A Morning's Ride Near Tarsus

An American Lady Tells of the Discovery of Prehistoric Ruins There

By MISS E. H. BREWER

WE teachers in St. Paul's Institute at Tarsus, the birthplace of the Apostle Paul, learned, some weeks ago, that a few short miles from the city were some ancient Roman ruins on a hill. Two gentlemen of our number went out to investigate, and found the ruins as described. They were about ten miles north of Tarsus, on a hill, rising 1,200 feet above the sea. Its top, a tableland, extends about four miles in both directions, and then descends quite abruptly on three sides, east, north, and west. On the south the slope is more gradual.

The village people call this "the Hill of the Pavement," and some of the older inhabitants remember the time forty years ago, when this was the regular route to the Cilician Gates, the famous pass through the Taurus Mountains, to the interior of Asiatic Turkey. By this way Cyrus led his army down to Tarsus, and Roman troops marched back and forth upon it. The wide plains of Central Turkey. The present carriage road has been constructed within forty years. The plain of level Cilicia lies between the Taurus Mountains and the Mediterranean Sea. The Cydnus River, coming down from the mountains in two branches through deep gorges, and uniting a mile or two above Tarsus, crosses the plain to the sea.

Several of the teachers and students of the Institute were eager to visit the ruins, so we made up a party, and prepared for an early start the following morning. It seemed as if we had scarcely gone to bed when the watchman tapped on the door, and called: "Ten o'clock!" Time here is reckoned by the sun, so ten o'clock meant at that season about four A.M. Sleepily we dressed, had breakfast, and prepared for the day. But, somehow, our calculations had failed, for the dawn came slowly, and fully three hours passed before it was sufficiently light to make traveling pleasant. We had left the city before the sun fairly rose.

The road leads almost directly north, and for two or three miles affords a fine cantering ground. We passed several villages. On the hill the scattered groups of ruins are known by the common name of Bairamlı. Passing one of these, we were met by a perfect storm of words, curses, and imprecations from a crowd of native women who rushed out upon us. They even resorted to stones. At first we could not understand the cause of this attack, but soon we ascertained that the men were away, and the women were really afraid of such a company of mounted persons. Our party numbered over twenty. This, and the fact that smaller companies had been there two or three times before, made the people imagine we were coming to take possession of their homes. As the last of us passed, the noise gradually ceased.

From another group of houses, a few women came, running out. "Look, look!" cried one. "See the lady carrying a hen on her head! I see the tail sticking out!" Sure enough, there were feathers on the hat.

The hill itself has not merely a rock foundation, but many loose stones, and the path is only a little less passes. The arch is of white marble, and can be seen from a long distance. According to some historians, both arch and road were built by Constantine the Great. The arch is fourteen feet wide, fifteen high and three in depth. It stands at the top of the hill and commands a view of almost the entire plain. The road, also of marble, which glistens in the sun, is ten feet wide, with a curb on each side, and extends for one or two miles in perfect condition. The stones are very smooth, grooved in some places for the horses' feet and in others worn by them. Going to the west from the arch, we came in about ten minutes to a few houses built of stone near a well. Our long ride had given us good appetites, and the food in our lunch baskets soon disappeared. We entered one of the houses and found, that part of the wall was formed by a circular stone, like the apse of a church.

After our rest, we enthusiastically started again, and in about ten minutes came upon a mass of ruins—tombs cut into the solid rock, half fallen walls, and sarcophagi whose covers have been removed, and whose contents have long since been rifled. Beyond these is a gorge difficult to cross, because of the large rocks and tangle of bushes, though it is easily passed around. On the further side, the ruins increase in number; there are immense cisterns covered with long blocks of stone, smaller reservoirs at different levels with connecting passages (perhaps for pressing grapes or olives), sarcophagi of single blocks, and walls, either of houses or fortifications, it is impossible to decide which. The only building which gives a clear idea of its purpose is a church. It is about forty by one hundred feet, and has an apse pointing toward the east. A partially preserved tower is at one corner. The other buildings seem to have contiguous walls. Nowhere is there the slightest sign of streets. Another collection of ruins is found a mile or two towards the northwest, and half way down the hill. A large part of the hill has no traces of ruins whatsoever.

Until a very recent date, no remains of the ancient magnificence of Tarsus, as it was in the days of Roman dominion, had come to light. It was the chief town in ancient Cilicia (now a part of the Turkish empire in Asia-Minor), and its situation on the wide and fertile plain of the river Cydnus favored its growth and importance. In that river, as the old historians state, Alexander the Great caught a dangerous fever while bathing. On its banks took place the famous meeting between Antony and Cleopatra.

rough than the rest of the surface. About half way up, we came upon the Roman road, which winds down the hill a mile to the east. Crossing this road and recrossing it higher up, we soon reached the top of the hill, and stood under the arch through which the road passed.

WHAT IS SALVATION?

A Sermon by REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, of Topeka, Kans.*

REV. C. M. SHELDON

SALVATION—What is it? On what terms is it secured? What are its outward and inward characteristics? What is it to be lost? What is it to be saved?

The greatest fact in history is the fact of Jesus Christ. The greatest task ever undertaken by any created being was undertaken by him, when he calmly proposed to seek and save that which was lost. The military ambition of Alexander, of Frederick the Great or of Napoleon, was child's play by the side of Christ's purpose to save a lost world. It is easy to destroy. Any ignorant or passionate person can do that; but to build up, to begin with a ruin and create out of it a living thing of power and usefulness—this requires vastly greater ability than brute force. The plan of Jesus was gigantic. It was no less than the salvation of the universe. This is such a stupendous fact that it requires the most serious consideration. Let us, therefore, consider the conditions that faced Jesus at the time he so calmly said to Zacchæus, "For the Son of Man came to seek and to save that which was lost."

A Lost World

There is no doubt the world was lost. When Jesus had ended his Temptation in the wilderness and come out to face the world, what sort of a world was it? Slavery everywhere of such a depth and character, that the bondage of the black man on American soil was like the relation of loving friendship in comparison. The man who had been on the Roman throne helping to uphold the military world into which the Son of Man was born, was a man who, according to the historians "never liked any one and never was liked by anyone." And according to all the accurate records, he was also a man who, during the last twelve years of his life, practiced unspeakable debaucheries and crimes, without hazarding his firm seat on a throne that held the native land of our Lord in a military grasp that was as cold as iron, and relentless in operation.

We must remember that the world that Jesus faced had no Christ of history. All the good things we possess to-day are stamped with his likeness. You cannot name one good thing in our civilization that has not somewhere about it the marks of this majestic figure of the Son of God. In Paris on very many of the most beautiful buildings are reminders of Napoleon. The letter "N" in many places speaks eloquently of his power. But on all of modern life wherever civilization has a mark of real value the Christ present. But not so in his own time. All that was to come.

In imagination step into a world without a Christ. That is what he saw. The depth of its ignorance, its contempt of brotherhood, its hypocritical clinging to the form that had no real substance, its worship of the false, the vicious, the tyrannical, the base, all this was so overpowering, that in order to face it all calmly and then say undismayed, "I have come to seek and save all this," must prove Christ to be either the most unparalleled egotist that ever lived or the most conscious of greatest power that ever lived. After two thousand years we are prepared to say the latter is true. But we could not say it unless, after this lapse of time, the world had grown immeasurably better on account of him. It has grown better, and every step of its growth is a step that proclaims him the victorious cause. Stand aside, Alexander, Frederick, Napoleon, a mightier than you is here. You were great killers, all of you. But this Captain of Salvation has saved more than you killed. Again I say, it is easy to destroy. But to save life, to save a lost world—that is the work of the greatest Being in the world, and his name is Jesus. "And ye shall call his name Jesus, for it is he who shall save his people from their sins."

Consider again the full meaning of that word, Lost. He came to seek and to save that which was lost. The characteristics of a lost world are: Indifference to God, to the fact of being lost.

An Experience on the Prairie

We were traveling over the prairie once, a small company of us, on a beautiful autumn day, entertaining one another with jest and story and song. The stretch of prairie seemed boundless. There was not a tree or shrub in the entire vision, not a living creature except a few birds and ourselves, and our team. Suddenly one of the party caught at the reins and called on the driver to stop. "I believe we are lost," he said, gravely, as he faced his companion, who was still smiling over some repartee. We stopped the horses and began to take account of our surroundings. After deliberate consultation, we were forced to agree that we were off the stage road which was the track to our destination, and probably, while occupied with our story-telling, we had let the horses take some abandoned wagon trail that branched off from it. We gazed helplessly about us. The sun was just going down. There was absolutely no sign of a house or of any mark of human habitation anywhere. We retraced our way in an effort to find the stage road, and after going back over fifteen miles, we found it, and reached our destination the next morning. More than once during those fifteen miles, as we trudged at the head of the horses in order to keep to the faint outline of that old wagon road, one of our party repeated the words, "We were lost all the time and didn't know it."

Sin Belittled

I have thought of those words many times since as peculiarly true of a lost soul. The most terrible time in a man's life is not when he is tortured with remorse and torn with anguish over transgression, or weeping hot tears of penitence. There is hope for him then. But the most dreadful of all conditions is to be lost and not know it, to be journeying on over life's way jesting and laughing, and actually merry-hearted, while in reality the sun is going down, night is close at hand, and the soul is lost. To be lost and not know it, or care about it, is a mark of a lost world.

Another mark of a lost world is the belittling of sin. In a recent trial in one of our courts in a neighboring State, a man who had been proved, beyond a doubt, to be guilty of bribery and perjury on an enormous scale, was declared innocent by a jury that perjured itself in the face of the most absolute testimony of guilt. According to the reports, the audience in the court-room went wild with joy over the result, judge, jury, bar and spectators joining in the most extravagant display of congratulations over this boddler who had escaped the penalty of justice. It has been said, on good authority, that in very many cases of bribery in this country, and the theft of public money by men entrusted with public funds, there has been, on the part of the guilty persons, the most remarkable absence of any clear convictions that they were doing anything very bad. "They all do it," was the remark one notorious boddler made to Attorney Folk, when confronted with the plain proofs of his stealing. And the man said it with a tone of injured innocence as if he were very deeply wronged by society to be called to account for his transgression.

It is the mark of a lost world to be indifferent about sin, to regard lawlessness with complacency, to fear not the act of transgression but the possible detection and punishment flowing out of it. And when Jesus entered the world there was no condition more common or more terrible. Compare such indifference to sin on the part of the people towards their ruler with the attitude the people of this country hold towards their Chief Executive. The standard has gone up in spite of sorrowful examples on the other side. It would not be possible for a President of the United States to be guilty of excessive sins against God and not be called to account by the people. Our definition of sin has, on the whole, grown larger. But it is because of what has been done by the Son of God to throw light on the repulsive character of all disobedience.

National Perversity

Another mark of a lost world is its emphasis on the outward instead of the inward life. We have a powerful illustration of this in the present war between Russia and Japan. Why should Russia want more territory? Why should it want more power in the way of navy or army, seaports or conquest? It does not cultivate or develop a tithe of its vast agricultural and mineral resources in the natural boundaries which belong to it. Its peasantry are so starved and burdened that it is said millions of them are born, live and die, without ever having their hunger once satisfied.

It is these peasants that are being mangled, tortured, blown in pieces, and brutalized still further by the horrors of a war, which has no excuse except that of lust for the outward glory of empire. If Russia were walking in the way of God, she would devote her gigantic resources, her unlimited natural wealth to the development and happiness of her people, and find abundant exercise for all her statesmanship in solving the problems that have all these years wrung the heart-blood out of men like Tolstoi and the Siberian exiles. But she is lost to God in a mad and wicked thirst for glory and empire, which is magnifying the outward at the expense of the inward. And any part of the world is lost that is doing the same thing. The man as well as the nation that puts money before the Kingdom of God, that counts on force as more valuable than quiet working of the Spirit, that says by conduct or by speech that the unseen and eternal and spiritual are not worth as much as the outward and the visible and the physical, this man is lost. He has the marks on him of a lost world. He belongs to that which Jesus came to seek and save.

Another mark of a lost world is its continual thought of itself. Selfishness is the sin of sins. Humanity has reached its lowest depth when it loves nothing so much as itself. Divinity has reached its highest height when it loves the world and gives the best it has to save it. The motto of Paganism always is "Get." The motto of Christianity always is "Give." A nation that in political schemes has no thought of world betterment that lives to glorify and magnify its own name, is a lost nation. The State that cares nothing about the general welfare of the other States is lost. This is a large part of the characteristic of the world when Jesus entered. The Roman cared little for the Greek; the Greek cared little for the Asiatic; and all of them had a contempt for the barbarian. Foreign missions, the idea of giving treasure, talent, money, itself, to save degraded, remote, repulsive savages—this idea was never formed in a lost world. It is not of earth this idea. It came down to us from above. All the culture, all the philosophy, all the knowledge, all the glory of the world, before Jesus was born, analyzed and weighed, you cannot find in them, all together, any passionate desire to save the lost.

The world of Jesus' time thought often and deeply and kindly of itself. There was, no doubt, much natural affection. There were also individual souls that rose higher in spiritual vision than others; and caught some foregleams of Bethlehem's birth-star. But with these exceptions it was a selfish world; hence a lost world. And just so far as it is selfish anywhere today it is a lost world. Nothing so stunts the growth, blinds the vision, dulls the spiritual hearing, paralyses the faculties, as selfishness.

Demoralized by Selfishness

Selfishness blasts the happiness of the marriage relation, and rears false caste and race prejudice between brothers who are children of the same God; it struts the coast of history with pitiable wrecks of nations and individuals, and emphasizes the need of salvation. "Wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me out of the body of this death!" exclaimed the great apostle to the Gentiles, wretched and groaning under the burden of self. He found the only answer when he said, "I thank God through Jesus Christ, our Lord." That is his only salvation from the constant warfare of self. And it is the only answer for any of us who may be lost in our own world of selfishness.

Does this seem like a small task now, that Jesus is before him? He came to seek and save all this. There is great significance in the fact that the words used are "that which." In other places Jesus is spoken of as a Saviour of the condition in which men live. Not so can satisfy his ambition but the salvation of the surroundings, together with the soul. That means more. Here is a child born in a slum; his surroundings are the worst possible. This little baby's atmosphere is saturated with drunkenness, vice, crime, unsanitary environment. The surroundings are hopelessly lost. The child grows up here without any choice of its own. It cannot help itself. Now the thought of salvation at Jesus had of a lost world, was not simply to see at this child through an inward regeneration sometime or other, should escape the pain of a future hell and get into a future heaven, but Jesus thought of salvation as to save the child and his surroundings too. The thought needs saving as well as the soul that must live in the thing. So the writer says "That which was lost." The whole social order is diseased. It needs to be healed.

This thought of salvation carries with it the thought of being saved to the uttermost: the man's body and his home and his citizenship, and his environment and his relations to other men, and his commercial and physical surroundings, all saved—a complete saving of the whole man in all details. This is what Jesus came to seek and to save. Not to snatch a brand from the burning here and there, but to quench the burning, and save the world itself. This is the purpose of the Son of Man, and its ambition is no less than superhuman in its design, to save that which was lost in order to be really and completely him who was lost. You are not really comfortable, if, on a freezing day, you have enough to eat, but do not have fuel to warm yourself. You are not fully developed if you are warmly clad but cannot read or write. Neither is it a full thought of God's purpose to save the soul if you do not save everything that makes that soul what it is. Jesus came to save that which was lost. It is the glory of his mission that his plan of salvation includes both the world which now is, and that which is to come.

Marks of a Saved World

We have asked what are the marks of a lost world. It is also necessary that we ask what are the marks of a saved world. How far has Jesus succeeded in his purpose? If two thousand years ago he planned to seek and to save that which was lost, it is fair to ask reverently what has been done? And what are the marks of the salvation he came to give the world?

The first mark of a world that is being saved is the presence of a divine standard of conduct among men. There is no question about its presence. There is of redeemed souls place virtue before money and the Kingdom of God before pleasure. The man of the world sneers at the possibility of any real good. Every man has his price, he thinks, and there is no

A Morning Ride Near Tarsus

But Tarsus throughout all time will be especially memorable as the birthplace of Paul, the greatest of the apostles. After his conversion he planted the Gospel there, and he visited it several times during his missionary journeyings.

We saw in all thirty or forty sarcophagi, and as many rock-hewn cisterns. The largest of these is twenty feet square. Many of the sarcophagi have simple designs, rude heads and panels. Only one has been found with an inscription. It is as follows:

EMMICEITE
MAPIWOTU
ANA..

To the southwest are many columns, some still standing.

What are these ruins? Are they Roman, or do they belong to an earlier period? Was this the summer place of ancient Tarsus? Was it a vast burial-place, or was it a fortress for the troops that guarded the plain below?

Most of the stones are roughly cut, more like prehistoric work than of the time of Rome. In the church, mortar was used, but not in the other buildings.

Xenophon wrote that when Cyrus came to Tarsus, the people fled to their mountains, to their strongholds; and evidently this is where a man "shall dwell on high" and where "his place of defence shall be the munitions of rocks."

Sardanapalus, the famous king of Assyria, was the founder of Tarsus, though the Greeks claimed to have been its chief colonizers. Strabo and Xenophon both mention the ancient city in their writings. In the time of Cyrus, when his troops were overrunning that part of the world, Tarsus was occupied by his troops twenty days, and was looted mercilessly. Many wars swept through it afterward, and it passed under many different masters. One of the Roman Cæsars changed its name to Juliopolis, but the older name again prevailed. Another Roman ruler made it a free city. The discovery of the venerable ruins mentioned in our correspondent's letter is one that will direct the attention of archaeologists to a locality where they have hitherto searched for ancient monuments and inscriptions in vain.

ing as genuine unselfishness. Poor pessimist! I am prepared to say there is a shining host of disciples of Jesus in this weary old world who would not deny their Master for all the riches, power, or pleasure on earth. Thousands would march to the stake for their faith, singing hymns of joy as they walked along. I do not believe that there is a member of this church who loves anything more than the Christ who has redeemed his soul. Into the whole world has come with the Saviour a standard of life which sees a different world from that on which the glazing eyes of the Emperor Tiberius looked cynically in his last days at Capri. It is a gratuitous insult to the Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world to suppose that the marks of his salvation are hard to find. How many disciples do you suppose there are right in this city, who have such an exalted standard of life that all else of small value beside the priceless fact of a good reputation, of an untarnished purity, of a spotless character? Not simply a cold morality, but a warm, enthusiastic, prayerful, spiritual consciousness of a divine presence in the life, as real as any fact and as much to be depended on as gravitation or sun heat. The presence of this standard is what keeps our community from lapsing into paganism as broad and deep as that which Nero ruled over. It makes no difference what we call it, "public opinion," "ethical judgment," a sense of what is "right and wrong," it is here, as it was present in the world when Christ first stepped into it. And it is one of the marks of a saved world, one of the sure proofs that he has succeeded in his purpose. The standard of the world's conduct can never again be any lower than Christ's. That in itself is a victory of which no other being could ever boast.

Another mark of a saved world is the fact of missions. The fact of missions is a greater proof of the victory of Christ and his supernatural purpose to save a world than his miracles. In fact the greatest modern miracle is the miracle of regeneration. "Greater works than these shall ye do," Jesus said to his disciples, and he meant by it just such events as the Day of Pentecost and the establishment of the apostolic churches, and the movement of the Gospel into Western Europe and its introduction into America. The first century witnessed more marked manifestations of the saving power of the Gospel. The Sandwich Islands were evangelized. Every foreign country opened its doors to the message. Martyrs in the New Hebrides and Pauting Foo speak eloquently of the enthusiasm and fidelity of believers. The Student Volunteer Movement is sending some of the best, most talented, and beautiful of our young men and women into the darkest places. Statesmanship in this new West has been appalled at the questions of pioneer settlement, but the Gospel of Jesus through its home missionary service has quietly and without boasting solved many of the most serious questions while the politicians were talking about them. The marks of a world that is being saved were never more clearly seen to-day.

Another mark of a world that is being saved, is seen in the attention the Christian world is now giving to the entire life of man as an immortal being. Never in all time have so many good men and women been so busy doing so many things to emphasize the value of little children, the need of better homes, the sin of neglecting the physical environment, the need of justice in the physical working world, the responsibility of nations as well as individuals to care for the oppressed, the duty of taking Christ into every department of human energy. It is not a figure of speech to say that the world is growing better. It is a simple historical fact. It could not help being better after Christ than it was before. His mission was not a failure. It was a stupendous success. It is a success to-day.

The greatest mark of a saved world is the presence of the Holy Spirit. He is here to-day in a degree so great, that it cannot be for one moment doubted that God is here accomplishing his purposes and confident of the final result. The fact that men do not or will not take medicine that is known to cure, is not proof against the medicine, it is proof of the stupidity and wickedness of the men. A doctor assures you by overwhelming evidence that your child can be saved by the use of a certain remedy. You refuse to let the remedy be used. If the child dies, it is not the fault of the doctor, it is your own. Christ is the remedy for a sick world. He can save it. His power to save has been tested in every possible way, and never yet failed. But if certain men refuse to let the Christ do his work with them, if the State, if society, if civilization at any point denies to Christ his remedial or saving power, this denial does not remove the fact of Christ as a Saviour. The sun is shining. I shut my eyes and say: "I do not see any sun." But my saying so does not blot out the sun. It shines on as calmly and as bright as ever, no matter what I say. Denials of truth, do not obliterate truth. Refusals to love God, do not remove the fact that God is love. The Holy Spirit is taking of Christ and showing him to the world. The denial of this fact does not change it. The assertion that the world is growing worse after all these centuries of the Son of God, does not change the majestic facts in the case, which prove that it is growing better every century. He came to seek and to save that which was lost, and he is doing it.

The Christian does not follow a forlorn hope. He follows a victorious Leader, one who was never defeated. In fact, he said he had overcome the world, and he wanted his disciples to do the same. Thank God for a Saviour who saves! He saves the lost. He has saved me! He can save any one who comes to him. He has come to seek and save. Thank God for a Saviour of a lost world! For a Saviour who seeks to save! For a Saviour who does save, and who will continue to save until the kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of the other! Thank God for a salvation which is so broad and deep, so wide and high, that it is not satisfied with any thing short of the redemption of the world, of the whole man together with his surroundings.

Rejoice, oh, Christian disciple, that Christ has sought and saved you. But let your prayer be, "Oh, Holy Spirit filling the earth to-day with thy presence, manifesting the love of Jesus to the world, make me holier as a witness to the world of thy power, cleanse me of the wretched selfishness that is a stumbling block to my brother who might otherwise see Jesus in me, give me the courage and the hope that are the bright and happy Christian heritage, and then send me out to preach the same Gospel that found me a sinner and brought me repentant to the foot of the Cross and to the heart of the crucified." As Jesus came to seek and save, even so may his disciples go on to seek and save in obedience to his last commands "feed my sheep," "disciple all nations." When the earthly race has been run, unite us in one great company of the redeemed to sing the song of Moses and the Lamb. Thank God for a Saviour who came to seek and save that which was lost. For there is none other name among men given under heaven whereby we must be saved except the name of Jesus. He is the victorious Head of the world

PANIKPAIL, KING DOG OF SLED TEAM

Peary's Arctic Quest

NATIVES OF WHALE SOUND

The Explorer Tells of His New Expedition, his Plans and Hopes

COMMANDER R. E. PEARY, C. E., U. S. N., the distinguished arctic explorer, who will start for the arctic regions early in July, has prepared the following interesting statement for the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD regarding his plans:

"Leave of absence being granted by the United States Government, and funds furnished by private enterprise, my ship, a powerful steel-sheathed steamer of oak, bow and stern steel-plated, engines of American make, rigged fore and aft, spike bowsprit, will push north to Grant Land, establishing, when practicable, generous caches along the route from Cape Sabine up to Cape Joseph Henry. Here I shall go into winter quarters. With returning daylight (February, 1905), we will start due north, with a small, light party, followed by the heavy main party. If successful in reaching the Pole, I should return to the ship late in May, or early in June (1905), break ship out of winter quarters, and return home late in September, about fifteen months after my departure.

"My route is up Smith Sound, Kennedy Channel, and Robeson Channel. A second vessel will carry coal, to be landed on Grant Land, near the northern entrance of Robeson Channel. With this reserve of coal I need not economize my steamer's fuel, but can keep the furnaces and engines going at top speed through the ice. The reserve will also be there to take my steamer back after her work is done, if she is still alive.

"From Cape Joseph Henry, the march toward the Pole will begin in 1905. The distance from this point to the Pole and back again is less than the average distance of my four sledging trips in 1892, 1895, 1900, and 1902. There is no reason why I should not equal this distance on my next sledging trip, gaining the Pole, and getting back in 100 days.

"I shall take my Eskimos with me to my Northern base. One white companion and faithful servant, Matt Henson, will accompany me.

"What is the North Pole? It is the exact centre of the Northern Hemisphere, distant in an air-line from New York 2,953 miles. It is the mathematical point at which the axis on which the earth revolves intersects the earth's surface. It is the spot where there is but one night and one day in every year; where there is no time, no longitude, no direction but south; where two steps only separate noon from midnight; where all the heavenly bodies move forever in horizontal circles. In getting there, we will pave the way for observations of refinement with the pendulum, and in the fields of magnetism and meteorology, which will enable a rigid determination of the figure of the earth, thus fixing the first constant in astronomical distances; and it will permit a clearer definition and more precise application of the laws of magnetism and meteorology. Reaching it will open up and reveal the economics of 3,000,000 as could be persuaded, a slow process of improvement instead of decay, commenced, which has grown to grand monopoly to the Crown. To-day the various settlements fringing the western coast have system and order, established educational bases, are prosperous content, and at peace with the world in general.

In my role of artist, I had the pleasure of accompanying Commander Peary on two of his expedition north. The opportunity to study the people of Greenland being afforded me, I carefully did so, and have found them extremely interesting.

On first arriving in Greenland one is surprised at seeing men with light hair and perfectly European physiognomy and stature, while as to their language and habits they are as perfectly Eskimo. Others, again, and indeed the greater part of the half-breeds, resemble South Europeans. Notwithstanding this intermixture, the Eskimo features are still by far the most prevalent, exhibited chiefly in a low stature, remarkably small hands and feet, and a brown complexion. The hair is coarse and raven-black; that of the men particularly is distinguished by its luxuriant growth, hanging down to the shoulders, and only sometimes cut off to a straight line across the forehead. The women, on the contrary, have their hair tied into an upright tuft, the size of which is a subject of pride; but this constant strain on the hair causes it to fall off early, especially at the sides, which greatly disfigures them. On the whole, however, some persons are more frequently met with among men than women, owing in some measure to the difference of their mode of life. While the business of the former is connected with daily exercise in the open air the latter, on growing old, mostly take to indoor life. When married, they care very little for dress and appearance. The cramped position in which they sit on the shelf or ledge at one end of their abodes makes them bandy legged, and causes them to waddle like ducks; while on the contrary, the young women appear smart and active, and even graceful in attitude and movement. The plumpness of their faces gradually shrinks, leaving nothing but wrinkles and furrows, and the little hair remaining is almost insufficient to be formed into a tuft. These deficiencies, with uncleanness and humpbacked attitude, generally make the old women extremely ugly.

square miles of unknown area of the earth's surface, which stands to-day as a challenge and a reproach to us, in that its attainment will be the sign of man's final physical conquest of the globe. The world-wide and undying prestige which the winning of it would mean, would be felt by millions of Americans at home and abroad. Should the Pole be won by an American, that fact would of itself be worth ten times the cost of the expedition ($200,000). The Pole is the last geographical prize the earth has to offer.

"The North Pole should be attained. The Smith

Sound or American route to the Pole is to-day the only practicable route, offering as it does a land base 100 miles nearer the Pole than any other, a less rapidly moving ice-pack and a wider extent of coast upon which to return; and, finally, the attainment of the Pole is especially an object for American pride and patriotism.

Singing and dancing are their chief amusements, and they are gifted with something of a talent for music. The fiddle and accordion are very common, but the music is learned by ear, and without any instruction. They saw some fiddles made by the natives themselves, and very cleverly made. Some of the young women have fine voices, and at divine service a number of melodies of native composition are sung that are very characteristic.

The most characteristic feature of the Eskimo dress is the similarity between that of the men and women. The trousers, or parkies, which are very narrow and reach only to the knee, are made of raw sealskin, trimmed with two narrow strips of some other fur, and dyed red, yellow or purple. The jacket—also of fur, reindeer, or seal—fits tightly around the body, without any opening, excepting for the face and hands. The hood is scarcely made use of, on account of the hair being tied up in an erect tuft with varicolored ribbons. A colored kerchief is tied about the head. The married women have a larger hood, in which they carry the babies. Long boots of sealskin, with the hair scraped off, and the skin dyed red, yellow, or purple, are ornamented by a band of white sin at the top, and a tape down the front, with the most wonderful sewing have ever seen. The stockings are of young seal-skin fur, the same length as the boot. A jacket of some colored material, sometimes cotton, is worn over the fur one. A deep-beaded collar of colored glass beads, with possibly earrings, complete the costume. Young maidens are distinguished by the addition of white embroidery, visible above the boot top. These colors denote the wearers—maids, red; married, blue; widows, black; women who are neither "maid, wife, or widow" green.

Greenlanders build their winter houses of earth, stone and sod. The hole, being cemented by the help of moisture and frost, is perfectly impenetrable to wind. The windows, made out of seal entrail, sometimes of glass, only admit a scanty portion of daylight. On entering the house, one descends into the long, narrow, covered passage-way, then up one step through the doorway. To a stranger this passage is inconvenient, being dark and often occupied by Eskimo dogs. The floor of the room is either of flat stones or boards. A broad bench or ledge runs along the wall opposite the window; here the inmates sit and work or lie down to sleep—men, women, and children together, sometimes dogs included. On the walls are hung various skins, from which clothes, harness, and other articles are made for use, barter and sale. A cylindrical stove from whence 280 sheets have been issued, besides many lithographic prints. The literature includes the Bible, Psalms, religious pamphlets, manuals in spelling, arithmetic, geography, history, etc.; stories, grammars and dictionaries in Eskimo for Europeans; a journal, with illustrations and official reports in Danish and Greenlandish. The greater part of the inhabitants are able to read tolerably well; every child learns to read at least the chief passages of their school-books. Writing, too, is about half as common as reading. The New Testament and Psalm-book are found in nearly every house.

Most Eskimos have only one wife, but he is superior over his fellows who maintains two or three wives.

There are no domestic animals. The dogs that draw the sledges are like Lapland or Samoyede dogs—sharp noses, thick coats of a tawny color, black, reddish, and spotted white-and-black, with bushy tails. They are unable to bark, but howl dismally. They are trained to sledge work only. In winter they are well fed; but in summer they are turned out to shift for themselves. The driver of a sledge team uses a short-handled whip, with a long lash, which, skillfully used, deals terrible blows. It takes long practice to use this whip, and my many attempts always wound my body and legs.

At one time the Greenlanders had no special marriage ceremony, except that the bride must be carried off by craft or pretended violence. Now the clergyman performs the ceremony in the regular orthodox fashion. The Greenlanders are clever and intelligent people, and more susceptible to civilization than some natives of other lands. They believe their country to be the most beautiful on earth, their race superior to the Indians, and some stands in the middle of the room, the stovepipe piercing the roof. In some of the houses an effort to keep them clean is visible, but generally rubbish of every description lies scattered about. Snow hides much which is brought to light by the spring thaw.

Greenlanders even deem it as superior even to the white man. Their intercourse with the Danes, and the kindness of missionaries and officials, have changed the bad impressions formerly held by these simple arctic people concerning the outer world.

What do these people live on? Flesh of the bear, seal, with sometimes blubber, fish, mussels, seaweed, and berries—the crowberry, cowberry and whortle berry; the first is the only one eaten. Added to the above, about two ounces of imported food daily, viz.: bread, barley and peas. The savory repasts of fat seal flesh are refined by the addition of biscuits and coffee, peas and barley boiled in soup, with meat, or fish sometimes for a change. Utensils, such as pots, tinware, plates, etc., are now furnished to the settlements, and many modern furnishings are becoming known and used.

The literature of the Greenlanders, printed in the Eskimo language, amounts to about as much as might make fifty ordinary volumes. According to Dr. Rink, most of it has been printed in Denmark. A small printing office was established at Godthaab, in Greenland, in 1862,

Trial for Heresy

ALTHOUGH the day has long gone by when men were broken upon the wheel or burned at the stake for holding "heretical views," or opinions not in accord with the dominant creeds, there is still a temptation, on occasion, for churchmen to demonstrate that the ancient bitterness has not altogether disappeared from the world.

It has lately been charged against a Professor in a leading New England University, Dr. Borden Parker Bowne, who is known as a prominent thinker and writer among the Methodists, that he has promulgated views and opinions that stamp him as unfitted either to teach or to preach the doctrines of Christianity. These charges have been sifted by the Methodist Conference in New York, in a formal trial, and declared to be totally unsupported. No doubt when the text of Prof. Bowne's writings and addresses was taken as a whole, and not in detached fragments, the accusations seemed far less grave than they had been made to appear. It is a trite saying that one can prove, even from the Bible, almost anything he pleases, if the good Book be taken to pieces and patched up to suit the accuser's purposes.

On the other hand, however, the fact is not to be overlooked, that in these days of fast-and-loose orthodoxy, when one hears from pulpits where he has a right to expect a pure and unadulterated Gospel, utterances that are little better than a confused jumble of rationalism, materialism, Buddhism and pantheism, it is time to call a halt in the tendency to too great a tolerance toward such offenders. Let the Church of Christ cling, with all the tenacity of which its leaders and people are capable, to the essential doctrines as set forth by its Great Founder, and let it make no compromise with error, nor with those who would drive a wide tunnel through the Rock of sacred Scripture, and sweep away, not only the miracles, but the Divinity of Jesus, the Atonement and even the personality of God himself. When a preacher embraces such doctrines as are in direct antagonism to the creed of the church or denomination to which he owes allegiance, it is his duty, as an honorable man, to retire from that church or denomination and step down and out. More dangerous even than such doctrines from the pulpit are these teachings when they find expression in the college classroom. Our young men who are to be the spiritual leaders of the future, may be poisoned at the fountain at the very beginning of their career, and sent out into the world as propagators of false and pernicious doctrines, which will involve multitudes in error hereafter.

Firm in the essentials, the Church can be broad and latitudinarian in all else, for Scripture is capable of many interpretations and the widest variety of presentation; but vital error, once detected, should be so vigorously dealt with that it dare not show itself in any orthodox Christian pulpit or theological university in our land.

Comfort for Homely People

WHY the word homely should have been applied to people who are not well favored and comely, is rather a puzzle. In the sense in which it is used by the woman who laments that she is not beautiful, it means plain, and has a certain sound of regret. The woman who owns herself homely is apt to deplore the fact, and when she looks in the glass she owns in her secret consciousness, that she envies her sisters with skins of satin, peach-tinted, abundant hair, regular features and whatever goes to the making of personal pulchritude. Yet even in youth the frankly plain woman may possess a degree of fascination in excess of the charm with which nature has endowed her fortunate friend. There are subtle qualities of magnetism which belong quite as certainly to the ugly as to the pretty woman. An extremely beautiful woman may be slow-witted and dull, not quick in the up-take, and in the long run she may prove a bore, where another woman carries off conversational honors and is the centre of a bright circle. Beauty of a kind is within the reach of every woman who cares for it. Nobody need have a muddy, coffee-colored skin, since a good complexion is the direct result of daily bathing, outdoor exercise, and the avoidance of too many sweets and fats. There is no need that any girl should ever be sallow, have a rough and uncomely skin, if she will attend to a few simple rules. These rules, too, are to be found everywhere in books and papers, and require only a little time every day for their observance.

Years ago, the writer knew intimately two young girls, one of whom, at eighteen, was the beauty of her school, and so remarkable in her carriage and bearing, that wherever she went she excited admiring remark. The other girl, her friend, was noticeably plain, with irregular features, indifferent complexion and tow-colored hair. Both women to-day are past middle age, but they have changed places. The once homely girl has now arrived at a matronly dignity which is itself most pleasing, her features have softened, her angles have rounded, and the kindly frost of time has dropped its silver upon her hair. She is a woman of graceful manner and most attractive appearance. Her friend has lost her early beauty and has gained nothing in return to make up for the lack. She is simply an ordinary little woman, rather shrunken and pale, at whom nobody who does not love her looks twice. The fact is that we make our own faces as we go on in life, and the plainest woman may reasonably expect to be handsome before she dies, if she have a beautiful soul.

Foreign Missions Under Fire

EVERY sincere friend of the cause of Foreign Missions will deplore the association of terms used by Dr. R. Heber Newton, in his article, "Religion and Religions," in the current issue of the North American Review. He says: "In the recognition of the truth that there are many religions but one religion, we open our eyes to the folly and the crime of the present attitude of Christendom to the other great religions of earth; the folly and the crime which effectually neutralize the heroic efforts of our foreign missionary work." It is, to say the least, an unfortunate association of terms, in writing of so grand and beneficent a movement as that of Foreign Missions. Have Carey and Morrison and Livingston and Moffat and Adoniram Judson—men of whom the world was not worthy, been guilty of folly and crime? Have they, following in the footsteps of the great apostle of the Gentiles, laid down their lives in a service that was not needed, and given themselves to a crusade which was superfluous?

It would appear from Dr. Newton's article, that the influence of the movement known as the "New Thought," has undermined, in his view, the essential principle of Christian missionary effort, which the Apostle Peter enunciated at Pentecost: "Neither is there salvation in any other: for there is none other name under heaven, given among men, whereby we must be saved." The essential unity of all things, which is the cardinal principle of the New Thought, is carried here to a misleading and mischievous conclusion. That there are elements of truth in all religions, no intelligent person will deny. They are found in the falsest and most debasing of superstitions. Without those elements, they could not hold together or survive. Hinduism, Confucianism, Buddhism, Mohammedanism have won their way, because, in the vast mass of error, there were some elements which tended to the elevation of the soul, and brought men into relation with the Infinite. But those elements have been so buried and overlaid by superstition and error, that they have been lost to the view of the masses, and the tares have choked the wheat. The essential unity, of which the New Thought makes so much, is scarcely discernible in the diversity, which has grown everywhere more conspicuous. The Hindus who came to our Parliament of Religions, presented to their hearers a view of their religion, which could not be recognized by the benighted Hindus at home. The debasing beliefs and practices which the learned Swamis repudiated or ignored as excrescences, were, to the unlearned Hindu, the essence, and, indeed, all that he knew of his faith. It is these that the missionary attacks and denounces, and, in doing so, he is rendering the people a service, and is not guilty of folly and crime.

Our Lord commanded his followers to preach the Gospel of his to all nations, and when his messengers go into heathen lands it is no business of theirs to search for "the essential unity" existing between religions they find there and the religion they bring; they would indeed be guilty of folly and crime in trying to put new wine into the old bottles—but to preach Christ the power of God unto salvation to everyone that believeth. All that is good in the old faith, the heathen and the Pagan will find in Christianity. Those among them who have been "seeking the Lord," if haply by feeling after him they may find him," are rightly urged to discard their old religion when the missionary comes, who is able to guide their groping hands in the right direction, and to accept Christ who will make them wise unto salvation. Let us hear no more of the "folly and crime" of such methods, but rather approval and encouragement of the preaching of the only Saviour who assures men that to as many as receive him does he give power to become the sons of God.

A Needed Organization

THE denial by his Honor, the Mayor of St. Louis, of some of the reports which have been in circulation as to organized designs to corrupt innocent girls during the Exposition, fills every heart with thankfulness.

But this denial will in no wise affect the formation of the Exposition Travelers' Aid Committee. Its work is to be preventive and sisterly, not rescue work in the conventional sense. Thousands of girls will go to St. Louis to seek employment; many will be stranded before long, and penniless. Many will need a helping hand when they reach a strange city.

The Committee bids fair to include not only representative women of the Young Women's Christian Associations all over the land, but good women from every department of benevolent work, irrespective of creed. It is too early to outline its scope, and to present plans now would be premature; but it already includes women whom the nation trusts. It confidently relies on the sympathy and support of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its readers in carrying this work forward to a successful issue.

The Secret of the Pole

COMMANDER PEARY is about to start on his ultimate effort to reach the long-sought-for North Pole. We wish him success, for there is probably no one who more richly deserves the fruits of his labor. The American people will justly feel proud should the Stars and Stripes be finally unfurled at the axis of our globe.

Commander Peary's interesting article in another part of this issue, outlines in detail the work he proposes. It is supplemented by a timely and a well-informed article on Greenland and its people, by Mr. Albert Operti, the American Historical Painter, who accompanied Peary as his guest on two expeditions, and who throws a very interesting light on the manners and customs of the dwellers in the Frigid Zone. The illustrations are from his photographs and color sketches, the full-length portrait of Commander Peary on the cover, being from a water-color sketch, from which a historical portrait is to be painted by Mr. Operti. The Commander is seen contemplating the view before him; in the background are the palæocrystic Polar ice, and the northernly point of land in Greenland, Cape Morris K. Jessup. THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

Tenants in Distress

SERIOUS trouble and severe hardship have been produced on the East Side of New York City, by a general rise in the rentals of stores and tenements. Evictions of tenants who cannot pay rents demanded, are unprecedented in number. The streets are encumbered by piles of poor furniture that have been put out of the flats and rooms by the owners of the big tenement houses, and the poor tenants know not where to go. No less than two thousand spurious notices have been issued in one week. A large proportion are against Jews, who work in clothing stores or in factories, and are obliged to live near the places where they are employed. It is stated that the increase of rent demanded averages one-fifth of the amount previously paid, and the tenants declare it is impossible for them to pay it. Little nests of four small rooms, for which they have been paying $15 or $18 a month, cannot now be rented under $18 and $22. The idea of the owners is that they are now paying higher prices, and that they have been compelled under the new tenement-house law, to spend large sums on improvements. The real reason, however, appears to be that, owing to the large immigration, especially of Jews, there is a greater demand for this class of dwellings, and when there is a greater demand there is always opportunity for raising the price. The tenants recognize the reason for higher rental, and the majority are willing to pay a five per cent. increase, but say there is no reason for so unreasonable a demand as twenty per cent. Their resentment is intensified by the fact that a large proportion of the owners are Jews, who might have been expected to show sympathy with their brethren. The worst transgressors are idlers, who lease the whole house or two tenement-houses, and sublet, in single rooms or flats, to occupants. So extensive is the movement, that a Protective Association has been organized to oppose dispossession proceedings in the courts, and to arrange for combined leases of tenement houses. Mass meetings are being held to make united protests against the unreasonable advance of rents, and to organize a new system of arbitration to avoid the wholesale evictions now threatened. At one of these a speaker said that during the past twelve months no less than sixty thousand evictions had taken place in New York City, though both owners and lessees were making enormous profits on their investments. It would seem from this statement, if it is true, that the poor Jew still suffering, even at the hands of his own race, from the same treatment that the wise king denounced.

There is a generation whose teeth are as swords, and their jaws as knives, to devour the poor from off the earth, and the needy among men (Prov. 30: 14).

Profit by Loss

A formidable fire which occurred in New York on March 26, has really proved a source of gain to a company owning two of the buildings destroyed. The fire broke out in lower Broadway, and was of so serious a nature that seventy engines were called out to fight it. Property in that section of the city is exceedingly valuable, and the loss, if the fire had spread, would have been enormous. Two of the buildings burned were insured for $230,000. An agent of one of the insurance companies involved, told a reporter that when the owners of the buildings had collected the insurance, and had sold the land at the enhanced price it would fetch, now that the buildings have been destroyed, they would gain a large sum, and therefore that the fire, which is usually calamity, had, in this case, proved a gain. Very seldom does it happen that people whose property is burned, are gainers by the loss, but there have been many who have lost their property, and have had no pecuniary compensation, who have had reason to rejoice over the loss.

What things were gain to me, those I counted loss for Christ. Yea, doubtless, and I count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ (Phil. 3: 7).

Offers to Sell Skin

An advertisement inserted in a New York daily journal a few days ago, announced that $300 would be paid for three square inches of skin from a healthy person of suitable complexion. The offer was made by a physician who has a patient suffering from a disease of the throat, which had made an ugly abrasion. All efforts to induce the skin to grow over it had failed, and he decided to try the experiment of grafting skin from a healthy person upon it. The patient is wealthy, and is quite willing to pay the sum offered for the needed cuticle. The advertisement produced speedy results. In twenty-four hours the physician received nearly two hundred letters from persons willing to supply the desired skin. Many of them were very pathetic. They told of extreme poverty, and begged to be permitted to obtain the money in that way. Some of them declared that they were ready to submit to any extent of suffering, if they could only earn the $300 by it. The physician said it had been one of the most painful experiences of his life to deny so many appeals. Only one person was needed, and so many must be disappointed. The large number of applicants shows how dire is the need of money among the people. It may be hoped that such persons will be saved from the temptation, which assails so many, to sell their souls for money. Our Lord's warning ought never to be forgotten.

What shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul. Or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul (Mark 8: 36).

Seeking His Parents

A boy, who says he is about sixteen years of age, went to the Police station at Tremont, N. Y., last week, with a request that help be given him to find his parents, from whom he said he had been stolen ten years ago. His story is that when he was a boy of six years of age, he lived in a town near Albany, N. Y. His parents were in fair circumstances, but he does not know what his father's business was, nor even his name. His own name is George, and he is called Hallenbeck, but does not believe that is his proper name. He was playing on the street one day when a man who was driving past, offered him some candy, and asked him if he would like a ride. He climbed into the man's buggy and the man drove away. He begged to be taken back after they had gone some distance, but the man refused, and told him he was to live with him in future. They went a long distance afterwards by train, to a town the name of which he does not know. He was kindly treated, except when he cried to be taken home. After a time he saw the man no more, but does not know whether he died or deserted him. He was put in a poor-house, and as he grew older he learned that he was in Delaware. He was taught the business of a baker, and worked for different masters, until he was able to get to New York and begin a search for his parents. Inquiries are now being made to ascertain if any family in the neighborhood of Albany lost a child ten years ago.

No clue has yet been obtained, and the boy is grievously disappointed. It may be hoped that whether he is successful or not in finding his parents, he may learn that it is possible for him to gain a parentage higher than any that this world can confer.

To as many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God (John 1: 12).

Telephone Records

A European journal describes the invention of a Danish electrician, who has applied the principle of the phonograph to the telephone. It renders it possible to preserve a permanent record of conversations over the telephone. The apparatus has the appearance of an ordinary telephone, but within the receiver is a highly-magnetized steel wire, wound on a sensitive reel. When the telephone is used, the wire is unwound by the action of the current, or by a clock-work attachment. The impact of the voice is faithfully recorded by the wire, so that at any time by reversing the process the conversation that has taken place can be reproduced, as in the phonograph. The situation of the wire protecting it from extraneous sounds renders its repeating power exceedingly accurate, and in the reproduction there are none of the crackling noises that are heard in the ordinary phonograph. It is easy to remove the record from the instrument and to preserve it or transmit it by mail, so that another person may listen to the conversation repeated in the same tone of voice, just as it actually took place. If these instruments should come into common use, there are many people who would become more careful of the words they use in speaking over the telephone. The consciousness that what they say might be reproduced at some future time would induce caution. But such consciousness might even now be felt if we heeded as it deserves the warning that Christ gave:

I say unto you that every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give account thereof in the day of judgment (Matt. 12: 36).

BRIEF NOTES

The sermon on the Broken Alabaster Box published in this journal on April 6 was by Rev. Frederick F. Shannon, of Harrisburg, Pa., whose name, by inadvertence, was misspelled.

In Uganda there is a noble band of 10,000 communicants, of whom one in every five is doing some definite work for God. The work of the European missionary is almost entirely that of training native clergy and evangelists.

The Rev. A. H. Kaylor and Miss Mary R. Robinson have been holding a series of evangelistic meetings for two weeks in the Sixth Presbyterian Church, Newark, N. J., of which the Rev. Daniel W. Lusk is pastor. During the two weeks, about one hundred individuals pledged themselves to Christ.

A TYPICAL SCENE IN THE TENEMENT DISTRICT OF NEW YORK

To Fight Pestilence in Panama

ONE of the most important improvements to be undertaken by our Government at the Isthmus of Panama, will be the cleansing of the strip of territory which separates the two oceans at the narrowest portion of the continent. As the result of reports made by sanitary experts who were sent to the canal zone to investigate, it has been determined that extensive and thorough sanitary operations must be completed ere work begins in earnest on the interoceanic canal.

It is estimated that our Government will have to expend fully two million dollars in transforming the newly acquired strip of territory from a hotbed of virulent disease into a condition of comparative healthfulness, as far as is practicable in a tropical climate; but there is satisfaction in the knowledge that this costly health campaign will not only redound to the benefit of the thousands of Americans who will be attracted to the scene of the canal, but will also contribute to the physical betterment of the people of the world's newest republic.

The first aim of the crusade will be directed toward affording protection from yellow fever and malaria to the Americans who go to the isthmus. The territory is marked by pestilence in every form. Leprosy exists in the city of Panama, and in almost every village along the line of the railroad to Colon. In Panama city, lepers are supported by charity, provided they repair to an asylum on the outskirts of the city, but there is no compulsory isolation, and lepers are found living unhindered in the most densely populated sections of the city.

Smallpox is prevalent, but not to the same extent as prior to the recent general free vaccination. There are many victims of beri-beri among the whites, Chinamen and negroes along the canal route, and such diseases as tuberculosis, dysentery, pernicious malaria and elephantiasis are always present. Dr. Claude C. Pierce, of the U. S. Public Health Service, who was recently sent to Panama by our government to investigate conditions, says that he found the city of Panama extremely filthy, owing to the antiquated sewerage system. A defective water supply contributes to the deplorable situation. In the dry season, water sells for one cent per gallon, and baths become a luxury which only the wealthy can afford. Dr. Pierce says that,

SOME OF THE LEADING PUBLIC MEN OF THE REPUBLIC OF PANAMA

has had the widest experience, particularly in Havana, where he successfully combated the dread disease in its traditional stronghold. He takes to Panama as his assistants a trained corps of men, who performed excellent work in a trip along the forty-seven mile railroad line from Panama to Colon, he found all the villages without exception filthy. Fever-bearing mosquitoes were seen everywhere. No sanitary regulations exist at La Poca, two miles from Panama, the site of the proposed mouth of the canal.

Despite this discouraging outlook, our Government is determined to render Panama healthful and habitable. Rear-Admiral Walker, Chairman of the new Panama Canal Commission, speaking of the matter recently, said: "I see no reason why, with the facilities the Commission will have at its disposal, and the assistance to be rendered by medical science and engineering, the canal section cannot be made as healthy as any tropical country. We have done it elsewhere, and we can do it at Panama."

The American governmental health campaign on the isthmus, will be under the direction of Col. W. C. Gorgas, the famous yellow fever expert of the U. S. Army. Rear-Admiral Rixey, Surgeon-General of the navy, also goes to Panama, to see that all possible precautions are taken to preserve the health of the members of the U. S. Marine Corps, who have been selected as police of the canal territory; but Col. Gorgas will remain on the scene, personally superintending operations. Col. Gorgas is a yellow fever immune his direction in Havana during the recent American military occupation.

The scheme, as mapped out, calls for the construction of water-works and sewerage systems for the cities of Panama and Colon, and the drainage of the districts between these cities. An immense amount of filling in will have to be done.

The city of Colon will have to be raised out of an unhealthy marsh, and there will be a number of towns in the interior which must likewise be lifted out of swamps. The water supply comes from the mountains, and the pipe lines will, in no instance, be more than sixty miles length, and, in some cases, will not be more than one-third that length.

"In Time of Peace Prepare for War"

THE time has come for careful consideration and analysis of some of the traditional sentiments or proverbs which hitherto have largely controlled our policy as a nation. One of the most delusive of these sentiments, perhaps, is that which heads this article. There are national ills to be cured, dangers to be avoided and probable crises to be met, which it is now urged, imperatively demand that, "In time of peace we should prepare for war."

In President George Washington's address to both Houses of Congress on January 8, 1790, he said, "To be prepared for war is one of the most effectual ways of preserving peace." This sentiment has been traced back to Horace, who died a short time before the Christian era, and it is quoted by Vegetius, born A.D. 375, who compiled a treatise on the "Art of War." In the biography of Horace, which appears in the Encyclopedia Britannica, a portion of his works is spoken of as written in the true spirit of paganism.

It is surprising that a sentiment so illogical and unreasonable has received such general approval. If its spirit be correct, we should constantly, in all the circumstances of life, prepare for trouble and danger. In the case of a trusted friend, whose companionship we greatly enjoy, we should anticipate estrangement. In times of plenty we should store our houses and barns with supplies that will amply provide for years of scarcity and famine. In every period of life we should have in mind that some member of the family may die, and keep ready mourning attire and even a coffin; for while war is a possibility, death is a certainty. There may also be accident, disaster or disease, and we should be prepared for all contingencies.

How burdensome life would be if this principle were adopted. The element of faith or trust would be excluded, and we could not fully enjoy any present condition. And yet, we are taught by rulers and legislators, by the public press, and even in the churches, that all men should be patriotic, and that patriotism means a constant preparation for conflict, involving enormous expenditure of money, burdensome taxes, and the demoralizing influence of an idle and unproductive class which make up the army.

Capt. Hobson has given the opinion that as this is the greatest nation in the world, it ought to have the largest navy. Upon this, a Georgia paper remarks:

If Capt. Hobson reasons well, and the United States, being the greatest nation, should have the greatest navy, the man believed to be the greatest should carry about his person, or have closely associated with him, the greatest fighting apparatus. . . . The American people are educated to fight. The rule is to resist evil and resent insult. It is not the humanitarian way. It is not the way of the most advanced and best civilization. For a while yet we must enjoy and gloat over our prowess, like a little boy with his first pair of pants. After a while we will begin to think of higher things.

Under the inspiration of this motto the Government encouragement of preparation for military achievement has been extended to our youth. I quote from the Christian Advocate, New York:

Arms and equipment for instruction purposes, field pieces, as well as small arms, are to be loaned to the schools, together with a supply of ammunition. No instructor will be detailed to a school having less than a hundred pupils under military training. This will guarantee that more than ten thousand young men of the United States will be under military instruction annually. In order to stimulate students, a record will be kept of all military instruction, and those having the best records will be given preference in the matter of appointment as officers in the regular army. In various aspects this is an expedient of doubtful promise to the highest welfare of the country.

In opposition to such views, regarding war and preparation for it, we have the impressive opinion of the historian Gibbon:

As long as mankind shall continue to bestow more liberal applause on their destroyers than on their benefactors, the thirst of military glory will ever be the vice of the most exalted characters.

The following is submitted as a summary of fundamental truth connected with this discussion:

1st. In considering this question it is not pietism or fanaticism, but simple common-sense, to recognize the fact of the existence of God and man's immortality and accountability. The patriotism which considers only the apparent interests connected with this world is a fiction. Preparation for war is a training that connects science and personal promotion with murder and destruction, antagonizes the teachings of Christ and ignores the world beyond. Is it true patriotism to urge men to die with weapons of destruction in their hands and murder in their hearts?

2d. This motto is opposed to the teachings of the Bible, that we are to love our enemies and to do good to them that hate and despitefully use us, and is contrary to the Divine order that we are to overcome evil with good. It is not patriotic even in the sense in which the word is usually employed, for patriotism is supposed to signify a desire and an effort to permanently promote the real welfare of the nation to which we belong.

3d. It is childish to claim that the maintenance of an army, composed of men whose activity and advancement depend upon war, does not tend to bring it about. As might a man give his son a thorough training in pugilism, and claim it does not encourage him to engage in pugilistic encounters.

4th. For the pretext called "national honor," there is little foundation in reason or righteousness as for that "personal honor," which, through the duels it has brought about, has deprived the world of many noble men, and chance sent them unprepared into eternity.

5th. When we consider the difference in the circumstances of the ancient heathen nations, from whom the aphorism came, it should, even if correct at that time, be no significance now. Then war was a trade, and was consistent with heathen belief, or rather unbelief, and preparation, for it bore no comparison with that needed now. It is simply the problem of furnishing a coat of mail, spear, shield and shield to each citizen or subject, and the navy consisting of a few small vessels of comparatively little cost. At present it means the employment of an immense number of men, tremendous supplies of artillery and ammunition and an expensive commissariat, entails huge taxes and an enormous pension list, which interfere with home comfort and business industry in time of peace.

6th. It would certainly be the case that if any of the great Powers, and especially the United States, England or Germany, were to announce a policy of gradual disarmament, assigning the claims of civilization and Christianity as a reason, and appealing to the other Powers to follow the example, there would be general acquiescence and wars would cease.

7th. The hatred manifested everywhere between men of the same city, State or country, is a type of the spirit that approves of and promotes war, which is in reality an enlargement of individual hatred and a multiplication of individual murder. The national action suggested above would establish a principle that would sooner or later regulate individual intercourse and tend more than anything that can be conceived of to bring about peace and good-will. The tone of the national life is reflected in individuals, and preparation is made for conflict with neighbors they will retaliate, unless they are our superiors, and trust in God to leave vengeance with him. THE FAR-EASTERN CAMPAIGN

NON-COMBATANTS AND REFUGEES FLEEING FROM DALNY

JAPANESE LADIES IN TOKIO MAKING BANDAGES FOR THE TROOPS

RUMORS of a battle at Kiulienching, near the Yalu, in which the Russians are said to have met with a reverse, were current last week in several European capitals; but no confirmation of the reports has come from reliable sources, and it could now appear that the boundary line along the river has been occupied by the Japanese practically without a struggle. This has naturally excited surprise, as a stubborn defence was expected; but it is explained to be merely a part of the new Russian programme.

Japan has sent the last of her transports from Saseo, and other home ports, and her troops are now in force at all the strategic points along the Yalu. Some have crossed to the further side unopposed, under the protection of Japanese gunboats and small cruisers, which are guarding the river. Wiju, which the Russians had partly fortified, and where it was expected they would have made the first formidable stand against the Mikado's advancing armies, fell into the hands of the Japanese without a struggle. When scouts entered the town on April 2, they found it evacuated by the Russians, and it soon afterward became evident that the latter had abandoned Corea, crossing the river, and withdrawing even from the defences they had constructed on the Manchurian side. According to the Korean native accounts, the Russians, after evacuating Wiju, crossed the river in boats, swimming their horses. Simultaneously, there seems to have been a like withdrawal from other points along the left or Korean bank of the river, by Russian troops who were stationed at Thyolsan, Chosan, Pyokdong, and other places. Their posts along the Tumen were also withdrawn. A sharp skirmish was reported at Chensu, fifteen miles northeast of Wiju, where several Russians were captured by the Japanese.

Thus, within two months after the first shot of the war, and without any important engagement having occurred, the Japanese found themselves in undisputed possession of Corea.

It is claimed, by those who assume to know something of the Russian plan of campaign, that Gen. Kouropatkin's purpose is to draw the Japanese on to a point where he can hurl his forces upon them effectively in the Manchurian plains. He is said to have decided that the control of the Yalu estuary by Japan's fleet would have endangered the Russian position on the northwest bank of the river and made a landing by Japanese safe and practicable at any point near the river mouth, in which event the Russian rear would have been threatened, as well as its front. It is surmised that Gen. Kouropatkin's forces along and south of the Yalu had been gradually withdrawing, long before Wiju was abandoned, and that the real fighting strength of Russia will be concentrated near Feng-wang-chang. One correspondent, writing from Harbin, says the Japanese may not be seriously opposed before reaching Mukden. All predictions regarding Gen. Kouropatkin's plans, however, are mere guesswork.

Japan's order of campaign must now be altered to meet the new emergency. In the interior of Manchuria, her fleet will be powerless. Far from her base of supplies, and compelled to cross the mountain ranges north and west of the Yalu, burdened with her artillery, and her strength depleted by the troops she must leave to guard every point along the way, her invading force will be less effective than if encountered in northern Corea. On April 4, it was estimated that the force within striking distance of the Yalu was 45,000 strong. Unless the Japanese delay their advance into Manchuria, the force which Kouropatkin's army will shortly encounter will be nowise as formidable as if the armies had met along the Yalu, and the advantage, it is claimed, will be clearly on the side of the Russians. There is no evidence of haste, however, on the part of the invaders. It may be General Kuroki's purpose to advance by slow stages to convenient bases, delaying a battle until all conditions are satisfactory, and this may mean a week—or even a month—of further waiting. It is even possible that Japan may fortify herself securely in Corea and await developments, instead of pushing on into the enemy's country.

Little that is reliable can be learned of the military movements on the Liao-tung peninsula. If the Japanese have landed a force at any point near New Chwang, as reports persistently assert, the expected attack on that city may take place at any moment. The city is now strongly fortified, and there are some 8,000 Russian troops there, with a formidable showing of artillery.

There is a persistent repetition of the report that King Edward has offered his services as mediator between the two contestants, and it is now added that the Czar has intimated his willingness to accept such mediation. Indeed, it is even hinted that the slow march of events in the field is due to the fact that peace negotiations have actually been opened. While such a story is impossible of verification, it is safe to assert that, however willing Japan may be to accept England's mediation ultimately, she will be apt to postpone acquiescence until the campaign has reached a more advanced stage. It is significant that simultaneously with this rumor comes the news that the Czar has ordered the mobilization of the Black sea reserves, and will shortly order the Baltic reserves to duty. There is little hope of meditation in any event, until the first great battle of the war has been lost and won.

OUR PILGRIMS TO HOLY LAND

(From a Special Correspondent)

MARCH 13, 1904.—Our first Sunday on the Atlantic between New York and Madeira, 1,900 miles from New York. It is the hour of church service. We are assembled in the dining-room. (There is, however, an overflow service in another part of the ship.) The congregation reads responsively with Rev. E. B. Allen, of Toledo, O., Psalm 107: 1-30.

As we read, we seem to hear a voice saying, "This day is this Scripture fulfilled," for we do see "the works of the Lord and his wonders in the deep."

The preacher of the morning is Rev. John Potts, D.D., of Toronto, the best known and the best loved man on the cruise. He takes for his text, Psalm 107: 30, and announces his topic on, "The Voyage of Life." A voyage must have a point worthy of the voyager, therefore the question, "Whither bound?"—the Holy Land—led to walk in the footsteps of our blessed Lord to the end we are seeking in this course—a noble purpose for Bible students and Sunday School teachers. The glorious port of heaven is the desired haven to be sought in the voyage of life. If the sea reveals the works and wonders of the Lord, how much more the voyage of life. These are manifested in providence and in grace, and in the history of the soul, in its illumination, submission, regeneration and sanctification, and in the culture that makes meet for heaven. And then there is the broadening out of this influence to myriads of souls.

The voyage of life should be under the control of one master-mind. Take this steamer for illustration: from the fireman to the engineer, from the humble sailor to the officers; all are under the control and direction of the captain, and the result is perfect comfort. "The Lord reigneth, let the earth rejoice."

The voyage of life is chance, tinged by great variety. Sometimes hearts are melted, because of storms of trouble that arise; but He who calmed the sea can calm all storms. All who go to Him in prayer can have this experience. The end of the voyage, in the case of Paul's shipwreck, was that all escaped safe to land upon broken timbers of the ship.

A great Sunday School was held which filled in every available meeting-place, Mr. Marion Lawrence of Ohio, being the Superintendent. The regular International Sunday School lesson was presented: the quarterly temperance lesson based on the story of John the Baptist, beheaded.

Madeira was called the "dream island" by the ancient Greeks. On the eighth day out we landed there, and found it a paradise of flowers. The missionaries came on board with a large basket of flowers. A mass meeting was held in the theatre, presided over by Hon. Alexander Dickson, the British Consul. The building was filled by the delegates. Such a concourse of Christians must greatly aid the missionaries. A service was also held in the sailors' chapel, Methodist mission.

Heart's-ease Home and its Workers

AMONG the many unpretentious institutions which are doing a great deal of good in a quiet and unostentatious way, is The Heart's-ease Home, a shelter for women in New York. It is conducted by an unpaid staff of volunteer workers. It is undenominational, and is wholly supported by contributions. The Reception House is situated at No. 313 West Fifty-third street, New York City, and there is a country home at Tappan, N. Y.

Many of those who come to Heart's-ease Shelter are found in the prisons, hospitals and missions, and are weary of their sinful lives, and wish to begin anew. Those who are willing to remain six months in the Home are accepted into the family of Heart's-ease, and are sent to the Tappan Home, where the influences are such as to be very helpful to the penitent ones. It is a Home where the erring ones can feel that they are safe with Christian friends. On Thursday afternoons, the Rev. Henry Brown conducts services in the Home. The inmates are taught housekeeping and plain sewing. The religious teaching is such that when they leave the Home, they go out to lead others back from sin to better lives.

Miss A. N. Smith is the Superintendent of the Heart's-ease work, and among her efficient aids are Miss L. B. Schofield, who is in charge of the Shelter Work in New York, while Miss Gretchen Lake and Miss E. J. Post, are associated with Miss Smith in the Heart's-ease Reading Room, and Mrs. Evelyn Allen and Miss M. F. McLaury conduct the Home at Tappan.

This work of rescue was begun with only thirty-six cents in the treasury. Rev. Leighton Williams consented to be trustee for the New York Shelter, and contributed $30, which was half the rent of the building for the first month. Furniture was borrowed to begin housekeeping. God quickly supplied all their need. Twelve beds with furnishings were given for Heart's-ease Shelter, and eight beds for the Tappan Home. These child-like Christians felt that for them there was only one way of getting their wants supplied. They prayed that some benevolent hearts might be moved to lend a helping hand. For three months they prayed daily for a library and piano for their reading room. One day a distinguished looking woman, who was a stranger, stood on the threshold of the Home, and asked if she might come in and look at the place, as she had heard of it from friends,

THREE OF THE HEART'S-EASE WORKERS and was interested. Before she left, Miss Smith knew that the cheerless and scantily furnished reading-room was to be made cozy and attractive. It is now equipped with shelves filled with books, a table covered with magazines, and a piano, chairs, and a couch with bright pillows, make it a charming resting-place.

One of the needs of the Home is cast-off clothing for the poorly-clad girls who come there for shelter. There are many who do not come from the slums of the gutter. The Heart's-ease workers go among all classes and endeavor to win them over to true living.

The Heart's-ease Reception House is open in the early evening, and remains open all night. Here respectable women are received and temporarily housed for two nights. If they are able to pay, fifteen cents is charged for lodging and breakfast, and ten cents each for dinner and supper. No poor wanderer, even if unable to pay, is turned away. Every Saturday evening a Gospel service is held in the reading-room, and when the weather permits, a song service is held on the street, in charge of Rev. William James, Mr. C. N. Putnam, of the Church of the Strangers, and students from Mrs. Courtland Peyster-Fields' Hepzibah Home. By the distribution of cards, weary, tired, heartsick girls are reached and brought to Christ. The cards read thus:

This ticket entitles you to one night's lodging and care. We offer you true friendship, when you are in need. "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved."

A Heartsease is printed on the card. The physicians, Dr. Marie L. Chard and Dr. Findley, give their services free.

Messages of encouragement from such friends as Miss Grace E. Dodge, have been an inspiration to the workers. Miss Dodge writes:

Heart's-ease has always represented to me a sweet home centre for our tired, tempted sisters, and I have been glad to have been allowed to share, even if only in a financial way, in the work. I wish for it the richest of blessings.

There have been many genuine conversions in Heart's-ease Home. The future of the work is bright and encouraging. Any letter of inquiry or contributions should be addressed to Heart's-ease Reading Room for Girls, a Shelter for Women, care of Miss A. N. Smith, 313 West Fifty-third street, New York. M. B. C.

"THE QUALITY OF MERCY"

THE best he could hope for was dismissal. To be allowed to go out of the office alone, disgraced, branded—this would be mercy and forbearance. What limited another's fears was his hope; but then he had the dock in prospect, the curt and irritable magistrate, the penalty of embezzlement, the unending shame of the jail. Or, perhaps, they would return him to the world, a marked man, an offence against his class, a traitor to his family and friends.

Waiting in the ante-room till the senior partner should be ready for him, George Hanbury clenched his fists till the palms bled under his nails. He was ready to face his doom and to take what he had earned, if he could but have taken it alone. Since the discovery of his defalcations had become inevitable, and during the awful two days that had elapsed since the discovery itself had taken place, he had realized, blindingly, vividly, the responsibility for the happiness of others which depends upon every man. His father, his mother, his brothers and sisters! This struck at them all; this was aimed at their home, at the completeness of their lives and the root of their self-respect and happininess. His head swam as the picture of their misery, when the news should reach them, took shape in his mind.

Alone he could have borne it. He had himself in a tight hold. Two days before, the manager had sent for him, and he found him with certain books open on his desk.

"Can you explain this?" the manager had asked, pointing to a page.

Hanbury looked, and knew at once that the blow had fallen.

"No, sir," he answered quietly.

"Nothing to say?" queried the manager, closing the volume.

"Nothing at all," was the quiet answer.

"Very well," said the other. "Mr. Burns will have to hear of this. Go back to your work."

Then elapsed two days of terrible punishment. His fellows among the clerks knew nothing, and it cost a strong effort to keep a calm face in their midst, and so escape remark. He was awaiting sentence from Mr. Burns, who came down to the office only occasionally, and whose very remoteness from the daily life of the business seemed to Hanbury to add another terror to his position.

The door of the inner office clicked, and the manager came out. Hanbury rose to his feet, biting his lip. The manager looked at him gravely.

"Go in," he said.

Hanbury entered. Old William Burns was sitting at a table. He was an old man, white haired, with a chin and cheeks hidden in a fluff of white beard. Keen grey eyes looked out from under heavy brows; his face bespoke strength and resolution, but there was nothing of harshness in it. It was very grave, now, and perhaps sad; but not hard nor vindictive.

They looked at one another in silence for a moment, the strong old man who had succeeded, and the young man who had failed.

"I have been hearing details of an embezzlement which you have committed," said the old man, slowly. There was a country burr in his voice. Hanbury noted it with an odd sense of having expected it. "I understand you make no defence?"

Hanbury found his voice with an effort. "None, sir," he answered.

"And you know what you have incurred by this crime?"

Hanbury nodded, gulping.

"Very well," said the senior partner, you know that, we need not say any more about it. I shall not send you to prison.

He waited for Hanbury to speak, but the young man could say nothing.

"If I permit you to return to your work and to gradually refund the money you have misappropriated, shall I be satisfied? Can I so trust you?"

The clerk started and looked up. William Burns was watching him wistfully. "Sir," stammered the young man, promise—I swear—"

His voice failed him, and he struggled with rising hysteria.

"Very well," said the senior partner, rising and speaking very gently, "we will consider that arranged. No word of this will be said again by anyone."

He held out his hand, and Hanbury grasped it feverishly.

"You are the second man who fell in this business, Mr. Hanbury," said the old man, in a low tone. "I was the first. What you have done did. The mercy you have received, received. God help us all."

They shook hands upon it, the two men who had been spared.

Proof-readers and the Bible

THERE is a tradition in printing-offices that the proof-reader's Bible is a dictionary. Be that as it may, there is certainly pressing need of a few presentation copies of the real Bible to the proof-readers. If the three principal newspapers in one of our Eastern cities had concluded, during the recent Easter season, to prove the truth of Bishop Potter's strictures against the lack of Biblical knowledge among people in general, they could not have done so more effectively. Strangely enough, a Boston newspaper opened the trio of laughable mistakes in a reprint of Bishop Potter's own remarks, copied from another paper, where he alluded to a reference to the "widow's cruse" not being understood at a dinner party, except by the person speaking. The Boston compositor, probably thinking of one of Stockton's short stories, set up the word "cruse" as "cruise," much to the glee of its esteemed contemporaries, whose turn was soon to come. For another paper followed with the report of the sermon preached on Good Friday at the funeral of a murdered artist and his wife. In this the reporter made the officiating clergyman say: "To-day is the anniversary of the Resurrection," or words to that effect. Now, even if the clergyman in his agitation had committed this lapsus linguae, it was quite within the province of the intelligent compositor, and the still more intelligent proof-reader, to have changed so obvious a mistake when they saw it. Last, but not least, came still another Eastern journal on Easter Monday, with the following: "City Missionary ——— gladdened the hearts of the inmates of every public home and institution in the city and suburbs yesterday, presenting to each a very appropriate gift in the form of an Easter greeting, enclosed in a neat little envelope containing a pretty Easter card, a booklet entitled The Song of the Syrian Guest, an illustrated poem on "Lambs," and another card with a poem on "Easter." Of course, "Emmaus" was obviously meant. These instances go to prove that Professor Remsen's recent deductions at Johns Hopkins University, that in examining eighty of the students he found that only one of the eighty could identify two obscure quotations from the Scriptures, and one of these was studying for the ministry. THE TIN WEDDING

THE tin wedding anniversary is not so costly nor so impressive as the silver wedding or the gold wedding. It is, however, as pleasant an occasion as either of these, or as any that fall between the radiant hours of the silver and the gold.

Gifts for the tin wedding are useful rather than ornamental. By the time people have been married ten years, their supply of kitchen furniture needs replenishing, and there are saucepans, pails, pie-plates, coffee-pots, spoons, and devices without number, which fill the housekeeper's soul with delight, if they are brought to her in their shining newness. To give a touch of festivity to the occasion, these utensils may be heaped with flowers, fruit, or bonbons. Indeed, so that the outside of the receptacle be tin, it is permissible to add what one pleases to the tin wedding present. A lavish father might pack his homely bucket of modest tin with gold and silver coins for a favorite daughter, and she would not in the least object.

The bride and groom who were in the dawn of day, so to speak, when they stood before the altar, have grown a little older a decade, but are still young people; the man, it may be, a trifle balder, or a wife stouter, and the woman a little more matronly. Children have entered the home, and their upbringing is a matter of great moment. At a tin wedding anniversary there are grandparents, not out of the running as yet, and perhaps great grandparents, in the venerable eventide of their years. If the clergyman who performed the wedding ceremony can be had as a guest, his presence lends an added dignity and charm.

Invitations to a tin wedding, should, if engraved, bear the dates of both the original wedding year and the present year at the top of the sheet, thus: 1894—1904, and follow this:

MR. AND MRS. EUGENE BROTHINGHAM REQUEST
THE HONOR OF YOUR PRESENCE
AT THEIR TENTH WEDDING ANNIVERSARY
MAY EIGHTEEN
FROM EIGHT UNTIL ELEVEN P.M.

S. V. P., which means that the favor of a reply is solicited, may be in the lower-left-hand corner.

A better and more usual way is to write little informal notes, and send them to relatives and friends, a week or ten days before the date of the function.

The bride and groom receive their friends, and the children, in pretty frocks or their best suits, assist in making people happy. A little supper is desirable, something to eat and drink add salt to hospitality. Games may be played, and music and song make festive the hours, while as a conclusion, everybody, old and young, may join in that beautiful dance, the Virginia Reel.

Molly's Correspondence

Up to the time that Molly is sixteen, she is more than willing that mother should read all her letters, and see every letter that she writes. About this period the old begins to enter womanhood, and presently she arrives at a station on the road when she wants what looks to her like surveillance. The mother who would retain her child's confidence unimpaired, must now be rather guarded, must not too openly and despotically demand as a right what may be granted as a concession. She needs tact, that she may not be the key to that fair garden where her child walks, and where the brook and river meet.

As a rule, a well-brought-up child, girl or boy, may, and should be, trusted, when passing through the transition stage which leads from youth to maturity. There is no harm in writing to and receiving letters from other young people, and the charm of this is much improved if an older person insists on reading all the little foolish things the young people say to one another. To older eyes the jests and the trifles look silly, yet they are not so. They are appropriate at the time when laughter bubbles up from an unseen fountain, and giggling is as inevitable as breathing. Don't let us forget that we were once sixteen ourselves.

The Blues

One would not mind the blues so much if they did not make one so blue. When melancholy clutches the soul and wraps heaven and earth in its folds, it is exactly as if one were groping through a heavy fog. There is no light anywhere. Just around the corner a piece of good fortune may be waiting, but the blue that blots the sunshine hides this from view. Just across the way the rough road may end in green meadows and flowery lawns, but the poor victim, stumbling over the stones, is sure that the rocky path will never end. In effect, the victim of persistent blues is for the

Kindergarten Classes

NO doubt child study is a cult of the hour, yet it is a good thing that mothers are trying in earnest to learn how best to bring up their little ones. Morning classes for mothers, where they are taught how to amuse, instruct, and otherwise develop the babies, are very popular in our cities, and certainly the young women who attend them gain something worth the acquisition. But there are hundreds of mothers who will never in their lives come within hearing or seeing distance of a kindergarten class. Shall they, therefore, be discouraged? Not at all. Here are some rules for them.

First, love the children. Love them before they are cradled in your arms. Love them in the happy months before they are born. Next, surround them during infancy with warmth, serenity and gentleness. It is a sin to scold, to shout, to scream, to fuss and fume in the presence of a little child.

Teach the small sons and daughters to obey their parents without argument or delay. Have no "Wait a minute, mother," or "I don't want to," or "I won't," in your nursery. Gain obedience by gentle means. Control yourself first and know what you wish, and what you have a right to ask; then, from the earliest hour, train baby hands and feet to do as they are told. Harshness and penalty are not needed, where gentle firmness is the rule.

Be regular about the children's bedtime and particular about their meals. A good deal of naughtiness springs from indigestion and of nervousness from irregular sleep.

Husbands and wives should act as one, when they are also fathers and mothers. They should be a unit in their household government. I have heard of children who knew their father only as a strange man, who came home and scolded them on Sunday. Some mothers ignore their children's fathers in the family management. Here they make a mistake. If both work together, love together, and pray together, there may be good results, even if the mother cannot go to a kindergarten.

What Shall we have for Dessert?

The question in most households is as important as what shall we have for dinner. It is surprising how many men care a good deal more for sweets than for solids, and never consider that they have had a meal, unless it is finished with a pudding or pie.

At this season, salads are delicious, and should form part of every dinner. They may be varied, and composed of different ingredients. Left overs of potatoes may be made into a salad that is excellent with cold meat. Bits of any cold vegetable chopped into rice, or finely minced with a mayonnaise dressing, or a simple French dressing of oil and vinegar, laid on lettuce, are fine for salad. Nuts very finely chopped, and used as a stuffing for tomatoes or green peppers, are very appetizing. Salad is not dessert, though served with crackers and cream cheese it makes a good substitute for the latter, two or three times a week.

Strawberries, stewed prunes, a prune puff, a custard, a charlotte sponge-cake with preserves, crab-apple jelly and cream-cake, all make dainty desserts. And here are some excellent recipes sent by one of the excellent housekeepers who read this page:

CHOCOLATE CAKE

Two squares of chocolate; half cup of sweet milk; one beaten egg; cook to a custard. After taking off the stove, add one generous tablespoonful butter; half cup milk; one cup sugar; two cups sifted flour; one teaspoonful soda. Icing of any kind may be used. I use powdered sugar one cup; juice of one lemon, with water enough to dissolve. Better next day after baking. Keeps moist long time wrapped in oil-paper in tin box.

DOUGHNUTS

One cup C sugar; one egg; six tablespoonsful of melted fat; mix thin, add one cup sour milk, pinch of salt, a little cinnamon or nutmeg, and flour to mix stiff with spoon. Flour the board. Mold as little as possible. I mostly turn the butter over so as to flour both sides. Roll out. Flour the cutter before cutting. Try small piece to see if fat is hot. I always turn the doughnut over as soon as it comes to top. Fry nice brown; when all done, put in jar or box, covering tight. This is a nice recipe for small family. If too rich use less shortening, or mix little harder by putting in more flour.

PUMPKIN PIE

One quart sifted pumpkin, or one can; same amount of sweet milk; one cup C sugar; one cup molasses; three eggs; pinch of salt; one teaspoonful cinnamon; a half of allspice; a half of ginger. Makes three large pies.

A Swedish Grace

This is a form of grace, which children may learn and repeat:

God is great and God is good,
And we thank him for our food.
By his hand must all be fed,
Give us, Lord, our daily bread.

A STREET IN TOKIO, JAPAN

The eyes of the world are, to-day, fixed upon Japan. The little Japanese have proved themselves mighty men of valor, as they have battled against their hitherto well-nigh impregnable fortress foe. A street in Tokio is full of picturesque effects and as busy as Broadway.

time insane. No comfort slips into the dark interstices of his perturbed spirit, and if his fears are only fancies, the gloom is really intensified.

The remedy for the blues is sometimes plenty of sunshine, sometimes hard work, sometimes a tonic, and always a rally of faith in a divine and never-sleeping Providence that watches over us in all our ways.

Too Many Playthings

A mistake often made by mothers is giving children too many playthings at once. A little maiden in the olden times was very happy with one or two dolls. The child of to-day may have twenty, and a little mother cannot stretch her love over twenty dolls. It is as if she were principal of a school, or matron of an institution. Children should play with a few toys at a time, not litter the house with them. Lessons of order and system are best taught in childhood, as, in older days, one may care for things of more enduring moment.

THE UNIVERSAL PRAYER.

By DR. and MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS*

VERY one should be turned to heart-searching by the heart-cry of the disciples, who begged Jesus to teach them how to pray. They had been saying Jewish prayers from childhood, and had even been disciples of Jesus for more than two years, but who felt they had never yet learned to pray at all when they heard one of Christ's heart to heart talks with God. In reply Christ gave them what is called "The Lord's Prayer," which means that it was the prayer he taught us, for he never needed to say "forgive" for himself. At the World's Parliament of Religions, men of all religions, for fifteen days, began their conferences with this prayer. On two days Roman Catholic prelates led, Cardinal Gibbons and Archbishop Ireland, which is forgotten by those who, to please that branch of the Church, have, in some places, driven this universal prayer from the public schools. Surely our schools cannot fulfil their chief mission, to cultivate brotherhood among all classes and nationalities, if the divine Fatherhood, of which this prayer is the best expression, is ignored. Let it be brought back, wherever it has been banished, as a practical application of the world-wide study of this prayer on this "labor day."

Christ probably did not mean that we should repeat this prayer, but rather that it should serve as a pattern, as is plainly shown by Christ's words in Matthew, "After this manner, therefore, pray ye" (6:9). Christ neither forbade nor required forms of prayer, but he did forbid "vain repetitions," which applies alike to children who "say prayers" with no thought of their meaning, and to heartless adult repetitions, whether of ritual or cant phrases. Probably all would agree that in private prayer it is better the full heart should pour itself out in its own words, while some would claim that when the soul is dull, a form of prayer may save it from giving up praying altogether. It would probably be agreed that in public also, if all could pray as well as those who have written "the prayers of the ages," it would be better for them also to pray in their own words. One might very nearly do this who would memorize all Bible prayers, and make them his vocabulary. Even the Methodists, who have been given as much to extemporaneous prayer as any, use carefully prepared forms at the sacraments of baptism and the Lord's Supper. It would be well if all preachers had a form of prayer for the President, who is left out altogether by many for some reason, perhaps for fear of seeming to introduce politics. The President whom a preacher thinks most in need of prayer is commonly the very one he does not pray for at all. As in many other cases of dispute, a combination of both ways of praying is better than either way alone. There are times when forms of prayer, always provided heart is put into them, are fitting, as on sacramental occasions, and at weddings and funerals, and other solemn ceremonies, when every word needs to be very carefully chosen. But in both public and private there should also be liberty for the spontaneous outpouring of the heart in silence or in speech (I. Sam. 1:13). And in preparation for this, even little children, after saying a prayer from memory, should be encouraged to think what special things they wish to thank God for, what sins they wish to confess, what help to be good, and what blessings for others they wish to ask for, and so make up a prayer for themselves. When parents fail to so teach, the Sunday School teacher and pastor should give such lessons in extemporaneous prayer.

Our Father. This suggests that prayer is like the gate where the child meets the father and tells him all his joys and sorrows. This word, "Father," suggests at once the best definition and the best defense of prayer. Prayer is like the talking of a child with his father, or of friend with friend (Ex. 3:11; Matt. 14:12). While it is easy for children to "go and tell Jesus," God the Father seems to many of them as indefinite as the air. There is no better way to create the feeling that God is personal, a mind like us, without a body, than by hunting out in the natural world of birds and beasts and insects and flowers and minerals, the geometry and machinery in which we see God planning as we plan, loving beauty as we love it, making the world work together in all its parts as a man keeps a machineshop working together. In the head alone there are pulleys beside the eye, a lever in the neck, dove-tailed, rubber-cushioned skull bones, a dome at the top, while the eye is at once mirror, kodak and opera glass. When we see our fellow-men thinking out these same machines thousand of years later, we think of Kepler's words, "O, God, I think thy thoughts after thee." Thus we come to realize that God is indeed a mind like ours, Our Father. It is called "anthropomorphism," to conceive of God as like man, but that is precisely the kind of God that is revealed not only in the Bible and in Christ, but also in nature. And it is in the likenesses of God to an earthly father that we find the best answer to the difficulties that educated people especially find in the doctrine of prayer, because it seems inconsistent with the reign of natural law. The answer is that despite the laws of nature, an earthly father hears and answers his child's prayers. A child is falling by the law of gravitation from a ladder. The father hears his cry, and by an act of love and will saves the child. So when a fire is raging by natural law, and a man at a window cries for help, a friend interposes and saves him. In the words of Browning,

Would I in my infinite longing do all for this man,
And think God alone shall not help him, who yet alone can?

The sweetest of all stories to illustrate "our Father" is that of a great emperor, who was riding in his grand chariot through the city street, when a boy ran to him through the lines of soldiers that constituted his body-guard. The soldiers cried, "Stop, he is your emperor," to which the boy replied, "He is your emperor, but he is my father." The King of kings is our Father. That assures us a friend, who has not only pity, but power to help. We say "Our Father, who art in heaven" to distinguish him from our father on earth. And what a help is earthly fatherhood to understand the Divine! Parenthood is the greatest honor God bestows on human beings, and sex should therefore be thought of with reverence as a share of God's creatorship. Let no one think of purity as unmanly, but rather let us say with Tennyson's brave knight:

My strength is as the strength of ten,
Because my heart is pure.

Hallowed be Thy Name. What a combination of sin and folly is the swearing habit. Much of it is due to lack of vocabulary. A man of scanty education wishes to be emphatic, and having a small stock of adjectives, fills up with curses. It might be a good thing to get up a tract for these swearers, containing about two hundred strong adjectives,

"AS HE PRAYED, THE FASHION OF HIS COUNTENANCE WAS ALTERED" to be used by the illiterate in place of "cuss-words." No one can be a real gentleman who curses his Maker and his fellows.

It chills my blood to hear the blest Supreme Rudely appealed to on each trifling theme.
Maintain your rank, vulgarity despise;
To swear is neither brave, polite, nor wise.

Imagine a gentleman, or even a boy, using his mother's name as he uses the name of his heavenly Father. Not alone God's name, but his House, and his Day, and his Book, are to be hallowed. Irreverence in church, jesting about the Bible, and Sabbath breaking, all these are offenses kindred to swearing.

Thy Kingdom come. Note that in this model prayer the suppliant does not first present requests in his own behalf and for his own needs, but God's cause is first, the hallowing of God's name, the spread of his kingdom, the doing of his will. This is in accord with the command that we so often forget in our selfish prayers, "Seek ye first the Kingdom of God." The very best story on this text, worth repeating whenever the subject calls for it, is the story of the venerable and loved William I., of Germany, who visited a school, taking up a piece of stone from the teacher's table, and asked, "To what kingdom does this belong?" "To the mineral kingdom." Then, plucking a flower, perhaps a Kaiser blum, from the teacher's bouquet, he asked, "And to what kingdom does this belong?" Then, intending to draw attention to the animal kingdom, he laid his hand on his own breast, asked, "And to what kingdom do I belong?" The child, instinctively wiser than their books, refused to classify the emperor with animals. After a pause a little girl answered rightly, "To God's kingdom, Sire." All things should be classified by their highest capacities, and the books should place man with angels and God in the spiritual kingdom.

Thy will be done as in heaven so on earth. This reminds us that not alone in heaven and in the heart is his will to be done, but also "on earth." Christ is to rule this world, not individual is to be saved by the cross, but society is to be saved by his crown, that is by making the law of Christ, by little, on divorce, the Sabbath, temperance and the law of our associated life—of business and politics a pleasure. We often use the words, "Thy will be done," as an expression of reluctant submission to some god. Here we find God's will in a brighter atmosphere, doing of God's will would make the world an Eden.

I worship thee, sweet will of God.

"How is God's will done by angels in heaven?" was asked in a certain Sunday School class. The answers were, "They do it immediately." "They do it diligently." "They do it always." "They do it altogether." "They do it with all their hearts." "They do it without asking any question." A little fellow, who had been hearing what God told Samuel, said to his mother, "If God would tell me something, wouldn't I do it?" A little while later his mother said to him, "It is time to go to bed." He pouted. "I thought you said you would do anything God told you?" "How do you know God wants me to go to bed?" "I know God said, 'Obey your parents,' and doing what they tell you for your good is the way to do God's will." It is not enough to do God's will. We shall not be doing it as it is done in heaven if we do not do it gladly. "When I was a little girl," said a lady, "my dear grandma asked me to bring her a glass of water. I was at play, and was vexed to be disturbed. When I had reluctantly brought it, she said, 'Thank you, my dear child, but it would have brought me more pleasure if you had done it willingly.'" Fifty years afterward that deserved rebuke left a soft spot in her memory.

Give us this day our daily bread. In the book of Ruth, it is recorded that Naomi left Bethlehem in account of a famine there, and remained in Moab until she heard that "the Lord had visited Bethlehem in giving them bread." Three times a day God so visits us. It is just as much God's will when it comes through the wonderful growth in the garden, as when it comes in manna from the sky, or is sent to the prophet by the ravens. Many a child has prayed for "daily bread and cake," or the like. God teaches us to pray for necessities, not for luxuries. Surely it is baseness and ingratitude to receive the wondrous food God makes and have no grace. About the best way is to let everybody at the table sing the doxology, or say some rhythmic grace together, such as:

For these and all thy gifts of love, we give thee thanks and praise,
Look down, O Father, from above, and bless us all days.

Forgive us. "Would you like to see God?" is asked of a little girl. "No," she said, shrugging back, "cos he's so big, and I's naughty." It is when our hearts are forgiven, we are glad to come to the promise of the pure in heart that they shall see God. "Do you cherish a hope that your sins are forgiven?" said an old, stern elder, to a boy, who had presented himself for church membership. "Oh, no," said the boy, cheerily, "I know Jesus has forgiven my sins, because he said he would. 'If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness'" (I. John 1:8).

As we forgive—aye, there's the hardest place in the prayer. We pray God not to forgive, we refuse to forgive anybody. One who was kept a grudge from becoming a Christian, was rudely awakened by a friend, who said: "Well, I will not shut God out of my heart, for the sake of hating somebody."

Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil. We can do a good deal to answer the first part of that petition ourselves, by carefully avoiding places of moral danger. God will deliver us from necessary trials and temptations, but when we put our hands in the fire, we should not expect him to prevent us from being burned. We are all of us very much like the little girl walking in the slippery street, who would not take her father's hand, but said: "I can walk alone." Not until she had fallen and hurt herself, was she willing to take her father's hand.

Reasons Why Some Prayers are not Answered

1. Ye ask and receive not, because ye ask amiss (Jas. 4:3).
2. If I regard iniquity in my heart, the Lord will not hear me (Ps. 66:18).
3. Your iniquities have separated between you and your God (Isa. 59:2).
4. Because of wandering from God (Jer. 14:10-12).
5. Because the Bible is neglected (Jw. 28:9).
6. Because of lack of sympathy for the poor (Jw. 21:3).
7. Lack of faith (Jas. 1:6,7).
8. Because of unbelief (Job 35:12).
9. Because of unfaithfulness (Luke 11:12).
10. Because we are unforgiving toward others (Mark 11:26).

THE CAST OF THE LINE

A Sunday Morning at the Bowery Mission

BY REV. C. H. MEAD, D D

"THROW Out the Life-line" is a stirring song to sing, but while thousands are singing it, it is a benediction to go down to the edge of a seething, boiling ocean of sin and "lend a hand" to a small life-saving crew, actually engaged in doing what the thousands are singing. And here, right among the scores of treacherous reefs, from each of which gleam the false beacon lights hung out by the wreckers, stands the Bowery Mission Life-saving Station, with as sturdy a crew as ever manned a life-boat or threw out a life-line. Capt. J. G. Hallimond (we give him a well-deserved title), with a warm heart, strong faith, an intense love for God and man, is a leader, equalled by few and excelled by none. It was the hand of Divine Providence that brought two such men as Dr. Louis Klopsch and J. G. Hallimond together. Never did one man find a more efficient worker, and the other man a more unselfish backer. Alongside of the Captain stands his devoted wife, and Mrs. S. J. Bird (lovingly called "Mother Bird"), and a number of men who never tire in telling the story of the day and hour they caught hold of the life-line, and were saved.

Day and night the wreckers are busy, and night and day the Life Saving crew is doing its work. If the former deserve the judgment of God, the latter are entitled to the prayers and sympathy of the hundreds of thousands of readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, as they sing in their homes and churches, "Throw Out the Life Line." Among the wrecks in the Bowery Ocean of sin are ministers' sons—yes, and ministers too—college graduates, lawyers, musicians, physicians, men who were born in homes of wealth, struggling by the side of others born in the slums, native and foreign born, all finding the same level in that awful whirlpool. The Mission doors open at eleven o'clock Sunday morning, to let in the crowd which has blocked the sidewalk for an hour before. In a few minutes the large hall is crowded, and the doors are closed against a multitude unable to get in for lack of accommodation.

We make our way through the pressing throng to the raised seats about the large pipe organ, and face the hundreds of men, who have been fortunate enough to get in. Human wrecks, awful to look upon, impossible to describe, but a sight which stirs your soul to the very depths, and begets within you a deeper hatred for the sin that has caused the ruin, and a stronger love for the Life-saving crew about you. There is work to be done, and the Captain and his crew are there to do it. From the organ comes a peal that only a master hand can bring out, and you turn to look at the player, and well you may look, and look again. A clean face, aglow with love, a musician whose soul is in his fingers as they touch the keys, and makes you feel that every chord of music he evokes shall be a strand woven into the Life-line to be thrown out that hour. Long ago he, among the wrecks, had caught the line thrown out, and was safely brought in, and now he is an efficient member of the crew.

"Mother Bird" greets her "boys" with a bright face, a cheery "good morning," and a few words of love and wishful anxiety for their souls. Some helpful songs, part by the whole audience and part by a male quartette, and then Captain Hallimond from his big, warm heart talks to God in a way that makes all feel the presence of the Saviour of men in the Life Saving Station. The Captain's heart is in his voice, and as he pleads for that sin-stricken multitude, every wreck among them feels that the pleader is his friend. No wonder that tears ran down many a bloated cheek. The writer had gone in there that morning to listen, but the Captain made it impossible for him to decline the request that the visitor should speak, and with the influence of that prayer upon him, he stood up before the company.

Who that loves God, could not speak under such circumstances? Speak! Look at that ruin, and keep your mouth shut, if you can. Sin, with its mighty power, written on human brain and body and soul! Before you, the ruined boys of broken-hearted mothers, and the wrecked husbands of heartbroken wives, and the debauched fathers of beggared children. What a company! Hungry in body, hungrier in soul, sunken deep in despair, will broken by long indulgence in appetite, hopeless, homeless, lost! They must be roused, and stirred, and lifted and saved. You must bring hope to the hopeless, and let them feel there is the mightier power of God that can "save to the uttermost." You must make them know what a glorious thing it is to live noble lives, and that by Divine grace, they can yet live nobly. Hunger, rags, bleary eyes, bloated bodies stare you in the face, but down in the ruin are immortal souls that can be plucked as jewels and trophies for Him who gave all for just such sinners as these. There is inspiration in the awful sight, and one can understand now the fascination that caused that sweet-faced Christly woman, Mother

Bird, to leave her beautiful home and go and live down on the edge of the whirlpool; that drew such a big-souled man as J. G. Hallimond into the place, to have his heart loaded down with stories of woe, that would surely crush him were it not for the upholding of Infinite Love; and that sent Dr. Klopsch and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to back up the work, with unstinted hand and warm heart. Speak! Yes, not in your own strength, but in the strength and name of the "Mighty to Save." As the message rings out, tears begin to fall, hard faces begin to soften and many a man realizes that God is in the Bowery. Who among you want to lay hold on Christ and be saved? Up go the hands, five, ten, a score, two score; hands that had clutched the bottle and found in it a power that has dragged down, down, and yet deeper down, now lifted up to grasp the Cross, where alone can be found a power greater than sin—a power that can break chains, sever bonds, conquer appetite, turn despair into hope, sorrow into joy, and death into life.

"Throw Out the Life-line." It is better to do it than to sing it, and there is a blessing to the one who throws it out. "There is Joy in Heaven Among the Angels," as repenting sinners lay hold of the life-line, and amid earnest prayers are brought safely to the Rock.

Shame on the State, that sets the decoy Tempting and ruining some mother's boy, but all hail to the members of the Life-saving crew who bring back to the mother's arms, the boy she has given up as lost.

Then follows another wonderful part of this wonderful service, and that is the words of testimony of men whom no one would dream were ever like any of the hundreds of wrecks filling the Mission this Sabbath morning. No wonder that that noble woman, Miss Helen M. Gould, at one of the week-night meetings a short time before, said with tears streaming down her cheeks, that she had never heard or seen anything like it. Such testimony is oft repeated, but none of these men forget the year, and the day, and the hour, when they were rescued. It is life to them to tell it, and one never tires hearing them. Many of them have good homes and good positions now, but they find the way back to the Mission to tell "the old, old story." And the telling it means much to those still in the whirlpool, and many a one "feels if He can do it for another, He can do it me." Cold type could reproduce the words of testimony, but not the ring of the voice and the glad face; these must be heard and seen to be appreciated, and any one who comes to New York and does not visit the Bowery Mission, is the poorer for that omission. More singing follows, an invitation given to an after meeting to those who have raised their hands, sandwiches and coffee are given to these hungry men, and the meeting is ended.

And then! Out go hundreds of men to find the same false beacon lights, behind which are skeleton fingers reaching out to clutch them by the throat, and drag their immortal souls down to the bottomless pit. See that sign on the front of yonder saloon across the way, "A large glass of pure (?) whiskey for five cents." Just imagine the effect of an announcement like that, in big, lurid letters, on a poor wretch with a weak will and a strong appetite. Yet that wrecker has paid the State of New York $1,200 for the privilege of putting up that sign and ruining these men! Oh government, what crimes are committed in thy name! A hundred go down to every one that is saved. All hail to that noble company who "throw out the life-line" for the one; but let the blush of shame mantle the cheek of Christian America, as the cries of the other hundred reach the ears of Him who hath said, "Vengeance is mine; I will repay." Oh, for another Luther to send out the cry, "That which God Almighty hath made wrong, no man can make right." "No revenue from and no permission for vice," should be the watchword of every Christian citizen.

The writer came away from that service with a stronger yearning for souls, a more intense hatred of sin, a greater love for that life-saving crew, and a deeper appreciation of the work THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is doing, at home and abroad, for the relief of suffering, the lifting up of the fallen, the brightening of the lives of the children, and the bringing in the day, "when the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdom of our God." Finally, let all readers of these lines, whenever they sing or hear, "Throw Out the Life-line," just put up an earnest prayer for God's blessing upon the Bowery Mission Life-saving Crew, who night and day, week day and Sabbath, are doing such glorious work "In His Name."

THE HOUSE of WHITE ROSES

It was only a small garden, and it did not require much attention from a gardener. But labor was difficult to obtain in the little riverside town where my husband and I resided. Odd men who "wanted a job" were tried in vain, "casual hands" offered their services only to be dismissed ignominiously before the day had half expired. Our pretty, well-trimmed lawn and our carefully-planned flower-beds looked like degenerating into a miniature desert and wilderness. I tired myself out trying to bring some order into the threatened desolation, and my husband, when he returned from town in the evening, grumbled at the failure of our carefully-laid plans to make our garden the envy of our neighbors. I may say at once that it was rare for him to grumble—so, perhaps, there was some cause.

This state of affairs came to an end when I discovered George Wheeler. The manner of my introduction to him was peculiar, and it was with some trepidation that I engaged him. In despair of finding a suitable man in the immediate neighborhood, I elected to see what a market-gardener, whose place of business was some little way out of town, could do for me. I called, and stated my business. The foreman—or perhaps it was Mr. Jones, the proprietor, himself—shook his head doubtfully.

"I fear I can't do much for you, madam," he said; "all our men are engaged just now, you see. However, I occasionally come across a man who wants a job—independent like—and if—"

"Oh, no, thank you," I said hurriedly; "I have had enough of them."
So I took my departure. I had not taken many paces down the road when George Wheeler overtook me, and unceremoniously introduced himself. I noticed at once that he spoke with the voice of a cultured man.

"I passed as you were speaking to Mr. Jones, madam," he said, "and gathered that you were on the look-out for a gardener. May I offer you my services?"

I looked at the man in some surprise. "I certainly require a gardener," I said; "but Mr. Jones told me he had no one to recommend at present. If you want a place, why did he not speak of you?"

My companion drew himself up. He was a tall man and handsome enough—besides, there was something very straightforward and honest in his eyes, something that made me take a fancy to him at once.

"Mr. Jones won't recommend me for more than an odd job," he said, "and rarely that. I suppose it's because he employs me himself when another man's wanted about the place. But he won't give me anything definite." He turned his big eyes upon me and added, with a burst of confidence, "I'm trying to save money, madam—for a certain reason—and I don't earn quite enough here. If I have a regular position for this season, it will be as much as I shall require, I think."

I naturally made a guess at George Wheeler's reason for saving up his money, and, womanlike, my sympathy for him increased. I did not go back to Jones' nursery, but told the man that I would engage him for a week on trial.

He came the next day, grave, civil, neat in his dress, and altogether a remarkable contrast to his predecessors. The change that he brought about in our hitherto neglected garden was something astonishing. Before the week was up I began to feel pride in it once more, and my hope returned that, after all, the surroundings of our house would become as idyllic as I desired them to be. My husband and I, I may say, had not been long married, and our ideas were still inclined to the idyllic side of life.

Owing to the nature of my husband's business at this time, it was my fate to be left much alone. Little wonder, then, that I spent much of my time in the garden, where I was wont to find George Wheeler, always neat, always respectful, and ready to enter into conversation with me if I so desired.

After my various experiences with gardeners I was surprised to find him a well-read man, with interests outside his ordinary surroundings. He spoke intelligently enough of the topics of the day, of people, of books. I had provided myself with a fair library, and from this I lent him books which after a day or two he punctually returned to me, accompanied by a few pages of carefully-written criticism. I need not say that his reviews of classical subjects were crude, but they never lacked sincerity.

One day—he had been with us nearly a month—I spoke to him of his prospects for the future. What would he do when his engagement with us expired? Would he by that time have put enough money aside to—? I could only vaguely hint at my meaning, for since the first day of our meeting he had never referred to his object in saving his money.

He looked up with a bright smile. "I hope so, madam," he said. "It costs me so little to live—and I have been saving for the last sixteen years."

"Sixteen years!" I cried in astonishment. "But surely—"

"Yes, indeed, madam. I have been engaged to be married for the last sixteen years—seventeen next Christmas. And I have worked hard and honestly to make a home for my affianced wife—he was fond of sonorous expressions—"and she has waited for me very patiently. I think that soon, in a year or two perhaps, we may get married."

"In a year or two! But why should you wait so long? A sober, honest man like yourself, a good workman—" I looked round on my neat, bright garden, transformed by his care. "Why, what was there to prevent your marriage years ago?"

"Only this"—his eyes sparkled with pleasure. Evidently he had few chances to speak of his lady-love, and was enjoying himself accordingly—"my Rose is too sweet a girl, too much accustomed to her own little luxuries, for me to ask her to share my struggles. So she said she would wait. And she has waited all these years while I have worked for her. I have got a tidy sum put by now, and—and I have bought a little house—furnished it, too—all for her."

It was a little idyll that appealed to my heart. "What a pretty name she has," I remarked, more for the sake of leading him on than for any other purpose.

"Yes," he answered, "Rose." He laid his hand on a flower vase in which blossomed a large white rose. "The sweetest flower of the garden. Don't you think so?"

I heard much of Rose after that, and his great partiality for the most beautiful garden flower was explained to me. Under his care roses had become the predominant feature of our home. We had a fine stock of trees, and he had brought them to perfection. Roses met the eye everywhere, and my drawing room was daily redolent with them.

One day he asked my permission to send her a bouquet, which request I readily granted. "Don't you often see your sweetheart?" I asked.

His face became slightly overcast. "No, not often," he replied. "I—I judged it would not be wise, as we should have so long to wait. But"—and here he brightened up—"I write to her every day. Those letters are the joy of my life. I tell her all about myself—all I do and think. I have told her how kind you have been to me."

He paused a moment, leaning on his spade, and then continued:

"I go every evening to my little house—the house I have bought for her—and I write my letters there. Of course, I don't live there myself. It is all for her."

A few days later I met my gardener in the road on his way back from the town, where he had been to purchase some roots. Of course I stopped and spoke to him.

After telling me the result of his errand he added, in hesitating tones: "The little house I told you of, madam—it is close by. Should I be presuming on your kind interest if I offered to show it to you?"

I accompanied him readily, curiosity playing no small part in my consent. We soon reached the house. It was a pretty cottage, standing a little way back from the high road, the porch and lower portion of it one mass of white roses. The windows were framed by the same beautiful flower. Loving care had been bestowed on the surrounding garden, and roses—white, red, and yellow—nodded at me on all sides. We entered, and George Wheeler conducted me from room to room. All alike had been decorated with taste and forethought; all were clean, bright and homelike. I felt certain of the touch of a woman's hand in the neat sitting-room.

"Surely," I said, "Rose has helped you here?"

He shook his head. "No, I have done it all myself. But it is for her—all for her."

In the window-recess of the small dining-room there was an open writing-desk. Some roses in a small vase stood on it, and paper was scattered about. "It is here that I write my letters," he explained.

Later, before we descended from the upper story, where there were three neat bedrooms, he opened a cupboard, and said with an air of mystery: "There is one other thing that I must show you, madam." The cupboard was full of dresses. "I have bought them all for her," he told me, with a happy laugh; "won't she be surprised?"

"I think Miss Rose is a very lucky young woman, and the sooner you get married to her the better," I remarked, as I took my leave.

The next day George Wheeler appeared looking miserable and depressed. I felt justified in asking him the cause of his unhappiness.

"I can't understand," he said, passing his hand over his brow; "my letter to Rose—it has been returned to me to-day. The same thing happened yesterday; but I did not think much of that, letters often miscarry."

PUZZLE No. IV.

THE son of a devout New England minister, formed, during his college course, a friendship with a young man who did not believe in the Christian religion. After graduating with highest honors, he announced to his parents that he had become an infidel. Determined to see something of the country, he set out on horseback for a western journey.

One night at a country hotel, he was informed that in the room adjoining his, a young man was dying. Sounds from the sick-room made sleep impossible; and he thought, "Is this man prepared for the great change?" and imagined himself facing death and the future. Next morning he learned that the young man, who had died during the night, was his college friend.

Shocked and overwhelmed, he gave up the western trip, returned home, became an earnest seeker after Christian truth, and soon after found himself in Andover Theological Seminary. The reading of a sermon entitled "The Star in the East" led to serious thought, which resulted in the determination to become a foreign missionary. "One such character as his," said a prominent New Englander, "is worth all the money ever spent in missionary effort."

Who was this man, and with what foreign land was he identified?

I tried to console him, but in vain. "She is angry with me—I am sure of it," he cried. Then he turned his big honest eyes to me, and made a strange request. "You have been so kind to me, madam; perhaps—oh, if you would—I dare not go myself, you see. Would it be too bold a request if I asked you to go and see her, and put things right for me?"

I don't know why I consented. I knew it was a foolish errand, but I suppose my sympathy for this curious pair of lovers had been aroused. I could not believe that the Rose of whom I had heard so much had behaved so cruelly.

So it was that I obtained the address, and, leaving my gardener wet-eyed, but hard at work, set out on my errand.

I found the house with some difficulty, for it was at the other end of the town. On ringing the bell, the door was opened to me by an old white-bearded man, Mr. Lane—Rose's father, I concluded him to be.

"You are Mr. Lane?" I asked, as pleasantly as I could.

"Yes," he answered shortly. "I have come, Mr. Lane, with a message for your daughter. May I see her?"

He looked at me with eyes wide open in astonishment. "I have no daughter," he said; "my girl Rose has been dead sixteen years."

Alas, such was the truth. The old man soon grasped the fact that I had come from George Wheeler, and, having asked me into his little sitting-room, explained the whole romance to me.

"He was wonderfully fond of my girl, was George Wheeler, and they got engaged to be married. But she died suddenly. You never saw a man take on as he did—for a while every one thought he was going too. But he got well, all except that he wouldn't believe she was dead. He thinks she is waiting for him, and that they're to be married soon. Writes to her every day. I take in his letters and tear them up—"

"His two last letters were returned," I said helplessly.

"Ay, I thought so," he answered. "I was away, and the new letter-carrier—he don't know. Don't you worry about George Wheeler, ma'am; he's all right—and happy."

Thus I learned the romance of George Wheeler's life. His delusion was harmless, but beautiful; and he carried it with him to the grave.

Songs by the Way, by Edith Virginia Bradt. A hopeful, helpful little book of verse, optimistic and sweet. The author writes with a sympathetic pen; this is shown in the poem entitled, "If we could know."

If we could hear as we pass along
The minor chords in our brother's song,
If we could read
The blotted lines in his once fair creed,
Would we not try
To lift him up, ere we passed by.

As we journey on, if we could know
How tired the feet that come and go,
If we could see
The heavy burdens, borne patiently,
I wonder, friend,
If we would not pause some aid to lend?

Deafness Overcome

A Device That Is Scientific, Simple, Direct, and Instantly Restores Hearing in Even the Oldest Person—Comfortable, Invisible and Perfect Fitting.

190 Page Book Containing a History of the Discovery and Many Hundred Signed Testimonials from All Parts of the World—SENT FREE.

The True Story of The Invention of Wilson's Common Sense Ear Drums Told by George H. Wilson, the Inventor.

I was deaf from infancy. Eminent doctors, surgeons and ear specialists treated me at great expense and yet did me no good. I tried all the artificial appliances that claimed to restore hearing, but they failed to benefit me in the least. I even went to the best specialists in the world, but their efforts were unavailing.

My case was pronounced incurable!

I grew desperate; my deafness tormented me. Daily I was becoming more of a recluse, avoiding the companionship of people because of the annoyance my deafness and sensitiveness caused me. Finally I began to experiment on myself, and after patient years of study, labor and personal expense, I perfected something that I found took the place of the natural ear drums, and I called it Wilson's Common Sense Ear Drum, which I now wear day and night with perfect comfort, and do not even have to remove them when washing. No one can tell I am wearing them, as they do not show, and as they give no discomfort whatever, I scarcely know it myself.

With these drums I can now hear a whisper. I join in the general conversation and hear everything going on around me. I can hear a sermon or lecture from any part of a large church or hall. My general health is improved because of the great change my Ear Drums have made in my life. My spirits are bright and cheerful. I am a relieved, changed man.

Since my fortunate discovery it is no longer necessary for any deaf person to carry a trumpet, a tub, or any other such old-fashioned makeshift. My Common Sense Ear Drum is built on the strictest scientific principles, contains no metal, wires, or strings of any kind, and is entirely new and up to date in all respects. It is so small that no one can see it when in position, yet it collects all the sound waves and focuses them against the drum head, causing you to hear naturally and perfectly. It will do this even when the natural ear drums are partially or entirely destroyed, perforated, scarred, relaxed, or thickened. It fits any ear from childhood to old age, male or female, and aside from the fact that it does not show, it never causes the least irritation, and can be used with comfort day and night without removal for any cause.

With my device I can overcome deafness in any person, no matter how acquired, whether from catarrh, scarlet fever, typhoid or brain fever, measles, whooping cough, gatherings in the ear, shocks from artillery, or through accidents. My invention not only overcomes, but at once stops the progress of deafness and all roaring and buzzing noises. The greatest aural surgeons in the world recommend it, as well as physical educators of all schools. It will do for you what no medicine or medical skill on earth can do.

I want to place my 190-page book on deafness in the hands of every deaf person in the world. I will gladly send it free to anyone whose name and address I can get. It describes and illustrates Wilson's Common Sense Ear Drums and contains bona fide letters from numerous users in the United States, Canada, Mexico, England, Scotland, Ireland, Wales, Australia, New Zealand, Tasmania, India, and the remotest islands. I have letters from people in every station of life—ministers, physicians, lawyers, merchants, society ladies, etc.—and tell the truth about the benefits to be derived from my wonderful little device. You will find the names of people in your own town and state, many whose names you know, and I am sure that all this will convince you that the remedy for deafness has at last been solved by my invention.

Don't delay; write for the free book to-day and address my firm—The Wilson Ear Drum Co., 1683 Todd Building, Louisville, Ky., U. S. A.

Answered Prayers*

The Wisdom and Love of God a Reason Why Some Prayers are Unanswered

WHY God does not answer some of the prayers that are offered to him, has been a continual source of bewilderment to many Christians. Sometimes the boons sought, appear to us undoubtedly good; the prayers are earnest and are offered in faith, and yet they are not answered. Why is it? The promise seems to be absolute, that whatsoever we ask in faith, believing, we shall receive, and yet it often happens that we do not receive what we have asked for in faith.

The opening of Christ's model prayer gives a clue to the problem: "Our Father, who art in heaven." The relationship of the Christian to God is evidently similar to the relationship between an earthly child and his father. No father would grant indiscriminately the requests of his son. For the son's own sake, he must deny some that are unwise, some that would be positively hurtful, and some that would be inappropriate at that particular time. It is no proof that the father does not love his son, that he denies his request. It might in many cases be easier to grant than deny. He does not like to disappoint his son, is sorry for the necessity, but because he loves him and is concerned for his welfare, he is firm. Should the son, in that case, refrain from presenting any more requests? By no means. That would be showing temper and disrespect to the father. His duty, rather, is to acquiesce in the father's superior judgment and wider knowledge, and while submitting his desires to his father, cheerfully bear to have them denied. Nothing is more natural than for a son who is in need of something going to his father for it. It is what we would expect him to do, if the confidence which ought to exist between father and child existed in his case. But that confidence implies not only the conviction of the father's ability to supply the need and his affection for the child, but a clearer and broader view than the child can have, of his real need. So it is with the Christian. He is invited and encouraged to pray, but he must not be resentful if God in his wisdom does not grant his requests.

Behold their threatenings. Arvine tells the story of an eminent minister who was bitterly assailed by a man professing to be a Christian, but who was a very cantankerous and censorious man. The minister, at last, hearing of the abuse which had been uttered against him, sent for the man, and received him in the kindest spirit. "You," he said, "are capable of being my best friend, because you see my faults, and have the courage to expose them. But I would like to have you tell me of them to my face, so that I may recognize and correct them. But first of all let us ask God to give you a clear insight, and give me a submissive spirit." So the two men knelt down together, and each prayed. When they rose from their knees, the minister said: "Now, brother, let me hear what it is in me that you condemn." The other replied: "I have nothing to say; you are a better man than I thought, and I own that it was I who was in the wrong." And from that time forward the minister was not molested.

Grant unto thy servants boldness. History furnishes many illustrations of that prayer being answered. None ever needed it more than Knox, who was essentially of a retiring disposition. The beautiful queen would have made her country submissive to the rulers of the Roman Catholic Church, and it needed immense moral courage to confront and prove her. Knox was convinced of his duty but shrank from it until, by a night wholly spent in prayer, he received strength and courage to go to her and tell her of the wrong she was doing. Luther, too, was warned, when he was about to set out for Worms, that he would be murdered, as Huss had been. He, too, had recourse to prayer, and being strengthened, went boldly into the presence of the Emperor and his princes and took his stand firmly for the truth. Cromwell, as his life shows, depended wholly on prayer for the power to resist Charles I, and while he would gladly have left the country, was so supported, that he took up arms and, though unused to war, defeated the royal armies and sent the king to the block. Havelock, Gen. Gordon, and many others, who were gentle and peaceful in spirit, became the boldest and most intrepid of commanders after having, by prayer, gained strength and courage from God.

A Portia of the Orient

THIS year the president of the Student Government Association at the American College for Girls in Constantinople, is a young and very charming Albanian girl, Miss

MISS KYRIAS

Paraskevi Kyrias. Her sister, a former graduate of the college, is in charge of the only school for girls in Albania. During the history of the association, the president has sometimes been a Greek, sometimes a Bulgarian or an Armenian, but never before a girl from Albania, where the people are so wild and uncivilized as to be called "bookless," even by the Turks themselves. Although the choice of president is entirely in the hands of the students, they never yet have made a mistake, but always chose the girl best fitted to hold the position, the one who has both the executive ability and tact which are required to control and combine so many elements.

A lady who is connected with the Department of Public Instruction in Holland, Madam Benheme, lately visited this college in Constantinople, and was delighted with the order maintained, and could hardly believe that it was the work of the students themselves. She was so much impressed with the advantages of such a system that she asked to have the details carefully noted down, for her to take back with her to Holland. She has since written that she has introduced the system into the Dutch schools, that it is working very well and is a great boon.

Thus America is influencing Western Europe as well as Eastern Europe and Asia through this college in Constantinople. The wonderful success of this college in the past has been due to its Christian influence over the nations represented in its student body, its academic progress, and to its far-reaching civilizing power. The college has also been, as far as could be expected, a financial success, as the income from the students amounts annually to from $10,000 to $14,000. It is not, however, a financial success as regards its endowment funds and facilities for work. On the contrary, it is in the greatest need. It is the only institution of its kind for a population of 50,000,000, to adequately represent American education. The president, Dr. Mary Mills Patrick, is in this country working for the college. Her address is No. 23 West Forty-fourth street.

The Storm Suddenly Calmed

I witnessed what I call a remarkable answer to prayer, in Northeastern Ohio, a few years ago. For the size of the church, there were a large number of young people, who had been away to various educational institutions, and were just home for vacation. On a certain Lord's Day evening, the pastor had arranged a special service for their benefit. A quartette of lady singers had been invited from a neighboring town. The house was full, in spite of indications of rain. Hardly had the service commenced, when a flash of lightning, followed by a peal of thunder that made the house tremble, threw the congregation into a panic, threatening such a disturbance of mind as to destroy all good from the service.

Two or three young men arose and went out to look after their teams. As they went out, the pastor said, in a calm voice: "Let us bow our heads in silent prayer, that God will cause the storm to be stayed until we have time to get home after the service." All heads were bowed for a few moments, when the pastor offered prayer that God would cause the rain to be restrained until the people had time to get to their homes, and that the service might be profitable to the people, and so honor God. There were a few mutterings of thunder, but not a drop of rain, until about an hour after the last person had left the house, when it fell in torrents. "Whoso is wise, and will observe these things, even they shall understand the loving kindness of the Lord" (Psalm 107: 53). BANCROFT A. BAILEY.

MEMORY MAKER

Food With Certain Elements Required in the Brain.

Poor memory means an ill nourished brain. The proper food to help and enrich the brain will thus help the memory as in the following case:

"I have not known what it is to enjoy good health, not having seen a well over 20 years and taking medicine most of the time until about a year ago. At that time I was suffering greatly from nervous prostration and general debility, the result of several severe illnesses from which I never expected to fully recover.

My memory was also so poor that it caused me much chagrin at times.

"I had often heard how Grape-Nuts helped other people's memory and that it was a brain food. Finally I was on Grape-Nuts for my meals.

It was so pleasing to the taste I enjoyed eating it, and after a time I saw a marked improvement in my health generally that I gave up medicine altogether. I not even using laxatives now that I have been unable to do without for years. Grape-Nuts helped my nerves, gave me strength, increased my weight ten pounds and I can now work and walk better and enjoy life as I never expected to again.

When my friends remark how well I look and act I tell them it is all due to Grape-Nuts. My doctor never sees me but he smiles with genuine pleasure at my improved condition for he is an old friend and would like to see me perfectly well, knowing how long and how much I have suffered." The Model Prayer

Christ's Response to the Petition of his Disciples

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

THE continual dependence of the Lord Jesus upon his Father was a marked characteristic of his whole life. We may be sure that his life in childhood was one of prayer. Again, at the very commencement of his ministry, we read (Luke 3:21): "Jesus also having been baptized, and praying, the heaven was opened." In Luke 4:42, we read that when day broke, he "went out into a desert place." And Luke 5:16 shows us the object of his retirement: "He withdrew himself into the wilderness and prayed."

Thus we see that it was the habit of his life to pray: he lived in prayer. But on special occasions our Lord gave himself especially to prayer. Thus (Luke 6:12) he spent a whole night in prayer before choosing the twelve disciples. "He went out into a mountain to pray, and continued all night in prayer to God." It was not a weariness, but a refreshment and strength to him to seek for, and to get, the mind of his Father. Probably he would not of himself have chosen "Judas Iscariot, which was also the traitor" (ver. 16), but his Father had a purpose in allowing his beloved Son to endure continually the presence of such a spirit. "Have not I chosen you twelve, and one of you is a devil?" He said to Judas (John 5:70). And it is significant that it was when Judas was gone out from the Passover feast to betray him, that our Lord could say: "Now is the Son of Man glorified, and God is glorified in him." He had passed his examination in this bitter school, entered into after that night of prayer. Another special occasion was that on which (Luke 9:18) he, previous to his first mention of his coming death and resurrection, drew forth from Peter the confession that he was "the Christ of God."

It was when he was praying, having gone up into a mountain to pray (Luke 9:23-29) that "the fashion of his countenance was altered." He was transfigured, and the men of God, Moses and Elijah, "appeared in glory, and spoke of his decease which he should accomplish at Jerusalem." In Luke 10:21, we are told the very words in which he once prayed, and we see in this account how he prayed in the Holy Spirit, as God wills we should. "In that same hour Jesus rejoiced in the Holy Spirit, and said, I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that thou didst hide these things from the wise and understanding, and didst reveal them unto babes; yea, Father, for so it was well pleasing in thy sight" (R.V.). Here again (Luke 11:2) we find Jesus praying. Shall we not join the disciples' prayer, and put ourselves to school with them that we may learn to pray, not as John the Baptist, but as the Lord himself? There is nothing about which we need instruction more than about how to pray; and God has most graciously given us his Holy Spirit not only to teach us how to pray as we ought, but also to pray within us as we are fully yielded up to him, "with groanings which cannot be uttered" (Rom. 8:26-27).

Our Lord answered his disciples' petition by giving them, as the very words which we may use, that which must first have been prayed out of his own heart up to his Father. He who sent the message by Mary Magdalene to his apostles: "I ascend to my Father, and your Father," teaches us to say, "Our Father which art in heaven," thereby assuring us that such a claim to sonship is not too bold. The burden of our Lord's heart ever was that his Father should be glorified, and he unites us with him in the petition, "Hallowed be Thy name." If this be not our first consideration, how can we be sure we are asking according to his will, and that therefore "we have the petitions that we desired of him?" (1 John 5:14-15). "Ye have not, because ye ask not." How true this! We have so little, because we do not pray much. "Ye ask and receive not, because ye ask amiss, that ye may consume it upon your pleasures" (James 4:2-3, marg.). Whatever we ask without seeking first the kingdom of God before our own desires, we ask amiss: for we are not in heart saying, "Hallowed be Thy name, Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done."

Women, What Will You Give to Be Well?

—perfectly, completely well, with that glad, joyous freedom and happiness in life and sweet personal loveliness which health and a well developed, graceful body alone can give?

WILL YOU GIVE FIFTEEN MINUTES A DAY? If you will, you can be free—you can be graceful—you can be lovable and wholesome; you can have bounding, buoyant, vibrant health which will make the world look sweeter to you and you will look sweeter to the world.

There is nothing in girlhood or womanhood so lovely as a healthy, vigorous, well-kept body, sound and sweet and wholesome, full of life and strength and fire. There is nothing which gives a woman such power to win love and to wield influence.

YOU CAN BE WELL WITHOUT DRUG

It is two years this month since I began to teach women the principles of perfect health through mail instructions, and my success has been marvelous. I cannot tell you how happy it makes me to realize that I have relieved over 7,000 women of all sorts of physical ailments by simply strengthening the vital organs, the nerves, the heart, and the lungs. I simply teach them the laws of nature. Their brains are clearer, their cheeks are rosy, their step is buoyant, they learn how to breathe, and they express that buoyancy and vivacity of life which is the crown of American womanhood. Surely what I have done for others I can do for you. My work cultivates that distinguished carriage and bearing which bespeak culture and refinement.

True attractiveness is in perfect health, grace of movement, free and wholesome thoughts. These are your birthright and may be retained by simply putting yourself in harmony with Nature.

I can do more for you than medicine can do. I can give you a Clear Brain, a Quick Perception and a New Lease of Life by simply strengthening the vital organs.

I can take but a limited number of pupils, because I give each pupil my personal attention. I do not work with a woman unless I am sure I can help her. I know I can Reduce Prominent Abdomens and Hips, build Thin Necks, Chests, and bring any woman to roundness and symmetry. I have done all of these hundreds of times. It is no longer an experiment with me.

Write to me, telling me your particular difficulties, and I will send you letters from my pupils and give you names of women who have been relieved of above difficulties. I will tell you just what I feel I can do for you. I will send you an instructive leaflet on how to stand correctly. Every woman should know this if she would be perfectly well. I charge you nothing for this leaflet and nothing for my information in regard to your case.

If you have not time to write me your case to-day, and really desire information in regard to my work, cut out this advertisement, giving me your name and address on the line below, and I will send it to you.

A CORSET IS NOT NEEDED FOR A GOOD FIGURE

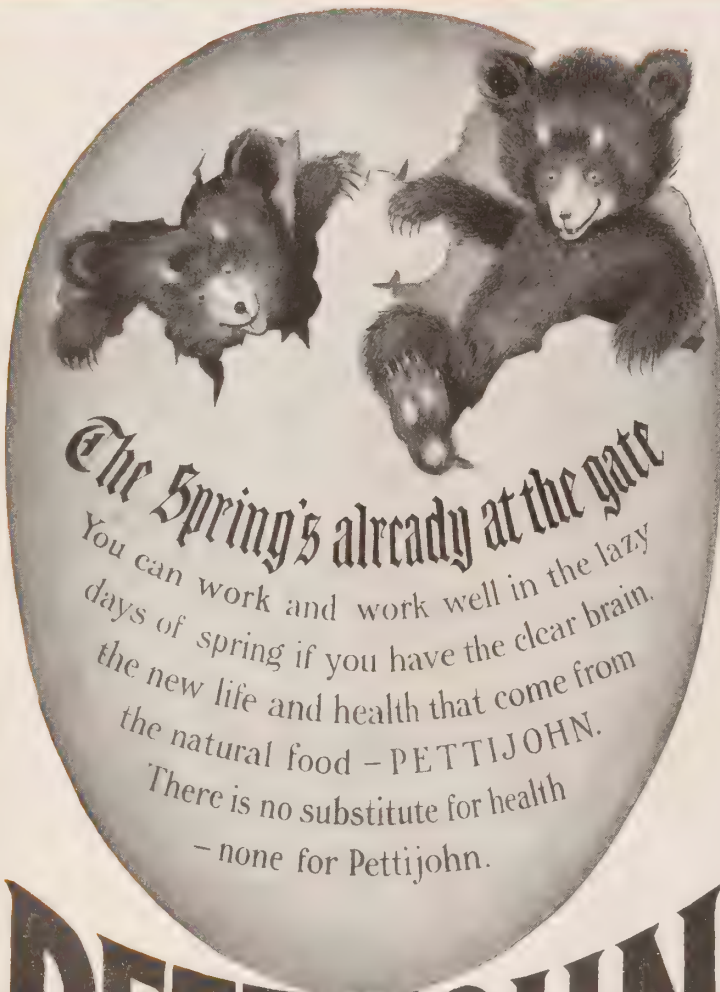

The following extracts from two of my pupils' letters to my desk as I write:

"I have grown from a nervous wreck to a state of good nerves."
"I have never felt perfectly well. I think, you have relieved me of indigestion and constipation which have bothered me for years. Since you have relieved me of these troubles, I have gained thirty pounds weight and have the throat and stomach which refused to open with medicine."

I will strengthen the Stomach, Nerves so that you will nourish. Strengthen the Lungs and Kidneys and in time so that the purities are thrown off from the system. Stimulate a Sluggish Circulation and the Blood Brought through your veins that the rheumatic twinges will disappear and you will be warm and comfortable. Strengthen Weak Heart or Lungs. Reduce Superfluous Flesh, or Round your Figure. Relieve you of Weak Lane Backs, Headaches.

A GALICIAN HOME IN WESTERN CANADA

A GALICIAN CHURCH AT ALBERTA

A PIONEER WESTERN CANADIAN SCHOOLHOUSE

The Winning of the Canadian West

By AUBREY FULLERTON

FROM a Babel of thirty tongues, and from as many different types of character, how to evolve a united and national citizenship, is the pressing problem of Western Canada. The vast country beyond the Great Lakes is filling up, on the Canadian side as on the American, with many thousands annually, and probably 200,000 immigrants—a large number of whom are not English-speaking—will come this year to make new homes in the new West.

How to reach the hearts of strange peoples in a strange land; how to harmonize the mixed elements of continental Europeans with the sterner but higher life of America; how to make educated and public-spirited Christians of the thousands now in the country and the other thousands who are coming, is the great question in the home mission work of the Canadian churches. The immense territory west of the Lakes gives an open mission field; its great natural resources ensure its permanency; and an annually increasing influx of population provides the need.

Religious work among the immigrants is carried on, as far as possible, in their own languages. They learn English in time, but their first need is a Gospel message in a form which they can understand. Converts from among themselves have therefore been of invaluable assistance to the missionaries, under whose supervision a number of native preachers and teachers are now at work. Schools naturally follow wherever a mission station is opened.

Perhaps the most important work among foreigners is being carried on among the Galicians, Doukhobors, and Hungarians. During the past three or four years some 80,000 of these people have come from Central Europe, and have settled in Manitoba and the Territories. They are strange peoples, with strange customs and opinions, but they are gradually adapting themselves to their new conditions, and, after some sensational displays of fanaticism, are settling down to the enjoyment of freedom and plenty. The most encouraging feature is that they are possessed of strong religious instincts, which make mission work among them the more possible.

Among the Doukhobors the churches have not attempted proselytizing, so much as a system of kindly co-operation, directing the moral sensibilities of the people into more rational expression and ridding them of their fanatical element. The Canadian Presbyterian

Of the religious belief of the Doukhobors, and the methods of work among them, one of the missionaries now in the field writes:

"To a Doukhobor, the ministry of the Gospel, the Written Word, and the knowledge of Church history, are unknown things. The reading or preaching of the Holy Scriptures are fully omitted by them during their devotional exercises, which consists in reciting prayers learned by heart, and in singing songs. They have been advised by some not to read the Bible, but, as usual in such cases, they are divided. One party is for the Christian teaching and schools, and the other party is for darkness. We find the school an excellent medium for reaching the hearts of the parents, and finding their doors open for the message of the Gospel. Every reading of Scripture during our visits at the houses is opened and closed with prayer, and we try to educate in the Doukhobors and their children a reverence toward the Holy Writ. The attendance at the houses is from seven to fifty souls, and we invite them to our mission station for the Sabbath services."

In many respects, the Galicians in Western Canada have proved more adaptable citizens than the Doukhobors. They are more independent, are quicker to learn, and, being of a marked economical turn, are acquiring comparative wealth. Quite naturally, therefore, they have a religious organization of their own, professing allegiance to the Greek Church. Several congregations have been formed, notable of which is the "Cathedral" at Wostok in northern Alberta. The recent opening of a new church in Manitoba gave significant evidence of their spirit of independence, the members of the congregation refusing to accept the domination of the Orthodox Church in Russia, and organizing themselves into an independent body. At one of their settlements, a new priest was

NEWLY ARRIVED HUNGARIAN IMMIGRANTS IN WESTERN CANADA

Church has four ordained ministers working among these people, and the Society of Friends of Philadelphia, has been warmly interested in their welfare since they first came to Canada. Both of these churches, as well as the Government, find education the keynote, and a large number of schools have been opened in the various settlements. Twelve young Doukhobors are now in Philadelphia, being trained by the Friends, and will soon return to carry on systematic work among their own people.

Vessels of Gold and of Clay

A Sermon by REV. CHARLES WAGNER, Author of "The Simple Life" *

"WE have this treasure in earthen vessels," says Saint Paul. The contrast between the comparative terms of his saying is not merely superficial, it marks a real and surprising antithesis. That the Gospel, the treasure he is speaking of, should be borne, announced, spread abroad in the world, by means whose fragility suggests that of the poorest kind of pottery, does not conform to our ordinary modes of judgment. It offends a tenet of practical wisdom, runs counter to a condition of harmony, of symmetry, even of seemliness. But we should not let this trouble us: on the contrary, we should welcome such a cause for reflection, be grateful to anyone who leads us back to the unwonted habit of thinking, of piercing the outside of things in order to come in contact with their reality. Let us look at the facts which inspired in Saint Paul his figure of the earthen vessel.

Under what poverty of form did the Gospel make its entrance into the world! In the case of such a work, momentous to the whole universe, of concern to the farthest reaches of the future, we should certainly have expected—and with how good reason!—some regard for appearance. Did not God, whose Spirit was acting through human events, owe it to himself to provide for the perception and appreciation of his work, to protect it against the hazards of mischance and improvidence? Was there not plainly a need of vigilance here, and a question of dignity besides?

Christianity's Humble Beginning

The great of earth do not mingle with the masses, unless their object be to escape attention. If God was to be made more manifest for a season at this epoch than at others, was there not need of forewarning believers and arresting the attention of the incredulous? Must not recourse be had to precursory signs, and a cry go forth to all the universe: "Bow the knee before the coming of the Lord?"

To such a sentiment, the proclamation of the law in the Old Testament exactly corresponds. On Sinai, all the prodigies of nature wait upon Jehovah. The whirlwind is his trumpeter, lightning, thunder and earthquake are in his train. No grandeur, no majesty, is lacking to this scene.

But attendant on the Gospel what do we find? Absolutely nothing. All its grandeur is invisible. Outwardly, there is only indigence and an absence of dignity, that is almost shocking—nothing apparent, but a few untutored words and some acts, whose author is manifestly indifferent to all care for publicity. Do we observe at least some concerted action to guard against the loss of these words from which the world shall henceforth live, or to preclude the danger of the distortion in the mouths of witnesses, of these acts upon which the most distant generations of men will still be meditating? Nothing of the kind.

Christ let fall the divine words from his lips like grain sown to the wind. It is pitiful to see these priceless pearls roll beneath the feet of passers-by; pitiful to think of the air's vibrating with the words of Eternal Life, and no one at hand to note them down! With reference to his acts, the same indifference. All we have to depend upon is the memory of a few ignorant fishermen, to whom the thought of taking the stylus in hand came only much later, when time had passed over their recollections. What a squandering of treasure! What negligence!

Unlearned Advocates

Christ himself did nothing to remedy it: He never wrote a line. Just once he took the trouble to trace a few characters. Did he in this unique moment engrave in bronze, carve in stone, some word whose flame-like strokes should give forth a radiance to the ages of the ages? No, he wrote in sand; and words we should have gone from far and near to read on our knees, were trodden out by the heedless feet of the crowd.

After the death of Jesus, who molded these apostles, for a time the sole bearers of the "Good News"? With what orator, what thinker, what trained writer did they take counsel? What hand retouched their unskilled prose? for their conquest of the world, what leader of men gave them his advice? Not a person of authority in these matters played any part among them; nothing in conformity with our esthetics or our wisdom was undertaken. When he foresaw the perilous phases of their future warfare, so far as preparation for meeting them was concerned, Jesus himself counseled that none be made.

Finally, Saint Paul arises, full-armed, conversant with the wisdom of the pagan world and of the synagogue, Saint Paul, who in our eyes saved the Gospel from the danger of remaining confined to a Jewish sect. But the Twelve contest his title to apostleship, and there is no recognized authority to settle the difference. What confusion! What strange incompetency! The most unimportant author, the most obscure playwright, in introducing his book or his play, makes the deepest calculation to array on his side all the chances possible. With what solicitude does he try to assure a favorable reception and a propitious future to the child of his brain and heart! But the Gospel entered the world under such conditions that its existence, its career, its obscure and endless martyrdoms, have more than once suggested the fate of a foundling.

Let us hasten to say that what was lacking in its inception, has been later accorded it with usury. It has seemed to the Christian world that there was injustice here to rectify, error to correct, and she has applied herself diligently to the matter.

She Has Withdrawn Christ

from contact with the crowd, from the danger of being confused with it in men's minds. She could not permit the cloak of humility thrown round his origin, his person, and his work, to become a reproach. The Church has surrounded her head with a glory to which no glory of earth is to be compared. In order to measure his grandeur, as it were, in degrees, she has marked off, by a regulated hierarchy, the distance which separates him from the common herd. Above the people she has set the clergy, whose successive dignities, from their humblest representative along the ascending line of titles more and more august, lead to the sovereign pontiff, a man-symbol.

After the parade of the personnel, the procession of dogmas. Here also is an ascension: We mount from the level of plebeian doctrines through those ennobled, to the series more and more imposing of royal beliefs, trailing across the history of the church the pomp of their spiritual empire. All these principalities and powers before which men's minds bow, are seated on as many thrones. Like that emperor of whom the poet tells, these dogma kings wipe their sandals on the heads of their servants, while away down at a vertiginous depth may be barely distinguished—men. And yet, in spite of its magnificence, the prestige of dogma is only a borrowed splendor, a reflection of the supreme dignity of the God-Christ, seated in unapproachable light, and separated from the purest gifts man may offer him by an endless ladder of angels and archangels.

Art in Adoration

About this divine glory, begirt with the nimbus of hierarchies and dogmas, religious art has thrown its magic cloak. Architecture, music, sculpture, poetry and painting have vied with one another in marvels. The eye has seen nothing more beautiful, the ear heard nothing more grandiose. Jesus once said, "The Son of man hath not where to lay his head;" but now we may say, "Who is like unto thee?" And is it not just? Is he not worthy of eternal honors? What symbol of adoration, what tribute of beauty, does not fall far short of his glory. What pious legend, what sublime doctrine, what worshipful harmony, what splendor of fresco or storied windows can express him? Shall the overflowing heart of humanity be constrained? When she comes to pour out at his feet her most exquisite perfumes from her costliest vases, what have we to say unless it be to repeat the words of the Saviour himself, "Leave her in peace."

And yet, an anguish takes possession of us in the presence of this golden vessel that has replaced the earthen one. Form should be a servant, and so long as it keeps its rank, its role is no less beneficent than legitimate; but it becomes baleful the moment it begins to rule, to have value of itself, baleful the moment that the sign, radiant in its own light, obscures the thing it signifies and ought to proclaim. And this is only too often the case. When beneath the splendor of heraldic dogma and dazzling ceremonial, I no longer recognize the figure of Jesus, I find my heart regretting his simple and human speech, his Gospel familiar to my misery, fraternal to my poverty. What is all this unfolding of beauty to me, if I no longer find in it the kindling of soul, the human tenderness, the largeness of heart, and all else that goes to make up the spirit of the Gospel? What is this enlarged and embellished dwelling-place to me, if he, the Friend, is no longer to be found there. The more I go about in it, the more homesick I become. Give me back Galilee of the Gentiles, the mountain where the beatitudes still tremble on the breeze—give me back the kindness that pardons, the glance full of eternal pity, whose sweetness has made so many poor sinners bless the night in which they first encountered it!

Power in Human Weakness

And returning in thought to that primitive simplicity, to that poverty rich in God, I divine why a wisdom different from ours has ordained that the treasure of treasures be borne in earthen vessels. I comprehend that obsession of Saint Paul which was forever bringing him back to some such utterance as this: "In the poverty of the means employed, in the weakness of his witnesses, God reveals his strength." And from farther down the ages an echo strikes my ears, blending with the voice of the apostle, an echo of the voices of the prophets: "He hath no form nor comeliness; and when we shall see him, there is no beauty that we should desire him."

Then it is not simply by exception or by chance that treasure is found in earthen vessels, but for the best things, as the Gospel, a vessel of clay is seemlier than one of gold; "that the exceeding greatness of the power may be of God, and not from ourselves." Here we are forced a step farther. The idea that anything of great value in the realm of the spirit could be void of beauty, in the absolute sense of the word, is untenable. We must open our eyes to a surprising revelation, to the fact that there is another beauty than that to which we owe our esthetics, and that a sense of this beauty of spirit, this world of inward splendor, imprisoned like a diamond in its unsightly matrix, must be acquired. This sense is indispensable to life. Human life, judged from without, is only clay: its fragility, its little parent worth, make an earthen vessel its precise symbol. If you regard only appearance, you will despise it, and for those very traits most worthy of love and appreciation; for not rarely the best it possesses is concealed under its most unshapely forms.

The good within humanity is worked out through gropings, struggles and sacrifices, even disfigurements, which make it misjudged and misunderstood. In the holy of holies dwells sorrow, whose beauty is of a kind not designed to flatter the sight. Like the rose-wind of old cathedrals, time-stained and dust-covered with it needs to be contemplated from within.

Christ's Ineffable Beauty

When the Christ, broken by his long martyrdom, figured by buffetings, his face pale and blood-stained, his forehead crowned with thorns, was no longer at but a living image of pain, Pontius Pilate brought out before the people and said to them: "Behold the man!" Wretched and suffering humanity, overcome with weariness, fixed its eyes upon him, and has not turned them away. It has found him beautiful with an ineffable beauty, a beauty that brings men to their knees.

This beauty of love and sacrifice has lightened our pathway, revived our hearts, pierced even the darkness of the grave with a ray of hope, and all other beauty has paled before it as the morning stars paled before the sun upon the mountain tops. In the person of the man, our misery has been transfigured in the holy and profoundest of revelations, and our eyes have opened upon a world of grace hitherto invisible: humanity appears to us in a new guise, beautiful from its very fragility, its anguished suffering and its wounds.

This lesson taught us by the Gospel may be carried into all the details of life which that Gospel is destined to sanctify and renew. We need to learn first of all, that under his weaknesses and even his stains, every child of man, however forsaken, however despised, however lost, holds within him a hope of God, in essence indestructible. And then we must learn to perceive the inner beauty of those whose life has been treated, deformed, mutilated as though by blows. It is often true that men become more interesting as they become more uncomely to look upon.

We love to see humanity in the guise of the child in the bloom of youth. Look well at it in this light, all your heart goes out in its favor. You can never be too deeply permeated with its charm or smile too often with its joy. He is no man whom the sight of the younger generations does not fill with lively sympathy who is not touched by their grace, responsive to their enthusiasms.

Charm in an Aged Face

And yet, all were it for us, if youthful vigor, glowing eyes, joyous enthusiasm, the privileges of youth, constituted our supreme beauty; for in that case could we end be aught else than a decadence, and what was could there be in a beginning which must lead to such a disappointing issue? But it is not so. There is a face more beautiful than the one which glows with the freshness of twenty years; it is the face of the man who have suffered much, if in their dim eyes there dwells a gleam of tenderness, and on their brows, deep furrowed like a page of the book of fate, signs of confidence remain; it is the face of a man who has struggled in righteous causes, and borne so many assaults that has become nothing more than a ruin. And when at last he falls vanquished, disappearing in the triumph of force, he is so beautiful that one must needs be God to judge him aright.

Let us keep hold of these truths, learn to discern the higher beauty. Let us take account of what manner men we are, and in our apparent defeat, feed on the inward joy, the comforting assurance, of those who bear treasure in earthen vessels!

Poor humanity, sacred and living clay that God himself has molded! Never has marble or bronze more animate by the hand of man, spoken as thou hast spoken; never has an immortal lyre vibrated with more worthy to be compared with that you give forth, warm and vibrant, under the impulse of grief or love, under the inspiration of the Spirit!

Hail to thee in thy humble griefs, under thy garb of poverty, through which the splendor of the soul shines forth! Hail to thee, divine dust, that hope upraises that charity enkindles, from which the shock of sorrows strikes out the heavenly spark of faith!

The Apostle of Simple Living

The Approaching Visit of Pastor Wagner, the Famous Author and Preacher

CORDIAL welcome will be given by the American public, especially by Christian men and social students, to a visitor from Europe, who has already won their respect by his charming book, The Simple Life. Charles Wagner has spoken in that work with the voice of a prophet, not the mere preacher, who professes to tell us what shall be on the morrow, but with that truer function of the prophet, the power to tell us what is amiss in our present life, and show the way to amendment. With keen insight in human character and social conditions, he has uttered words which find a response in the hearts of rich and poor alike, and has given shape and form to thoughts which have been struggling for expression in many a sincere mind. Not that he claims originality, or sets up to be a philosopher, with a nostrum for the cure of social ills, but with the humility of a disciple of the Master, whom he loves and serves, he bids us learn of him, and take into our hearts and lives the principles of his teaching. Probably nowhere on earth, so much among ourselves, is his message capable of doing so much good, for we, of all peoples, have most completely overlooked the fact on which our Lord insisted, that "man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth." Mr. Wagner pleads for simplicity in life, not a simplicity which would stupidly try to turn back the wheels of progress, and revert to the quieter and simpler conditions of the lives of our forefathers, but to a recognition of the fact that a man is neither happier nor better because of the increase of the facilities and conveniences of modern civilization.

We have boasted so much of our railroads, our telegraphs and telephones, our sewing machines and labor-saving appliances, that we are almost ready to pity the men who lived when these things were not. They have unquestionably added to the comforts and advantages of life. But have they made us more contented, more virtuous, more brotherly than those who did not have them? We know they have not, and for the reason that they do not affect character. Even education, which did penetrate deeper, has not improved the disposition; and a man who has mastered all the sciences, may be as unloving and as unlovable as he who knows nothing of them. Even liberty, as our author points out, is fatal or life-giving, according to the use made of it.

Unless men are made capable and worthy of it, public life becomes impossible, and the nation, undisciplined and unrestrained, goes on through license in the inextricable tangles of demagoguery." We see then to this, that, not by our environment, nor even by education and social facilities, but by the inner character and the outward expression of it in relation to others, do we become happier and better. There is nothing new in this; Christ taught the same philosophy; but we had overlooked it in our conceit and our haste, and we needed the prophet's voice to bring us back to first principles.

Charles Wagner is a man eminently fitted for his vocation. The characteristics which have made our Lord so beloved, even by men who will not identify themselves with his church—that love for men and that tenderness with the erring, and that sympathy with the suffering and the unhappy—are possessed by this teacher in a marked degree. "I have lived," he says, "with rich and poor, wise and ignorant, city folks and peasants, Germans and French, believers and atheists, the champions of the past and the champions of the present, and I have understood and loved them all. I love life as humanity under all their wholesome, sincere forms, in all their griefs and their hopes, and even in all the tests of thought and deed. 'I am a man; I deem nothing in humanity alien to me.' I am a pagan and an ancient, a child of nature come to God through Christ. I belong not to the sad but to the joyous Christ. I follow Christ because I have heard him speak in natural language—the language of humanity—and because I have heard beating in his heart the heart of all. Therefore he is not for me a person who was and is no longer, but the eternal contemporary of us all. . . . Myacles, dogmas, forms which worried me at first, worry me no longer. Across them all I see only one thing—man in search of God, God in search of man."

What wonder that a man who has come so near to men and whose sympathy and love are so deep, should be able to reach the hearts of men and interpret for them the problems of their lives!

Charles Wagner is fifty-two years of age. He is by birth an Alsatian, and is now a pastor in Paris. His father was a Lutheran minister, who died when his now famous son was only seven years of age. The widowed mother, with her five children, of whom Charles was the eldest, went to live with her own family taking her children with her. Charles was educated at the village school and made fair progress. At the age of fourteen he was sent to Paris, to study under a Lutheran minister, and three years later took his degree of B. A., in the Sorbonne, and then went to study at the University of Strasbourg. He succeeded in obtaining employment as a tutor, by which his mother was relieved of his college expenses. Thence he went to Gottingen to complete his theological studies. On his return home he became assistant to an aged Lutheran minister, and subsequently having crossed the frontier into France, he settled at Remiremont, where he remained until 1882, when he went to Paris.

The beginning of Pastor Wagner's work in Paris was humble and unostentatious. He opened a Sunday School in the section where workmen had their homes, and in the evening he would talk with any who came to him. Gradually these talks became lectures, and the upstairs room in the Street of the Gunsmiths, in which they were delivered, soon became inconveniently crowded, chiefly with young men. A hall was hired on the Boulevard Beaumarchais, which also was filled every Sunday night with a congregation of earnest, thoughtful hearers. Latterly he has held meetings on Sunday mornings in the Boulevard St. Germain, at which a more highly educated, philosophic audience assembles. At the close of his lectures, he invites questions, which he answers in direct, straightforward fashion, with a kindliness which shows how tender is his heart. There is little of doctrine, as we understand the word, in his utterances, but intense practical teaching. He firmly believes that the teaching of Christ is the solution of all the problems of the time, and is as applicable to modern life as it was to the life of Christ's own audiences. Men are to become better, and the nation is to become better, and the whole world better, by men leading better lives. That is the gist of his message. He would have men discover what are the essentials of life, and to think more of them and less of the outward and artificial forms. Let us have a beautiful picture, he says, be the frame what it may. A "Union for Moral Action" is an organization which has grown out of his teaching, and it has a weekly journal to which he is a regular contributor. Its ideal is unselfish labor, a fraternal spirit of helpfulness, a clean life full of sympathy for the unhappy, and suggestions of kindly co-operation. Circles for mutual improvement were organized, which developed into popular universities, of which there are now twenty in Paris, and a hundred in other parts of France.

Pastor Wagner's life in Paris has been a very busy one. Besides his Sunday School, and his morning and evening lectures, he has been a voluminous contributor to the periodical press, and has written a series of small volumes which have been translated into English by Mary Louise Hendee, and have been published in this country by McClure, Phillips & Co., of New York. Among them are: Justice, Youth, Courage, Along the Road, Around the Hearthstone, Be a Man, The Better Way, and the book by which he is best known—The Simple Life. In them all there breathes the same spirit which rises above sect and narrow classification of creed into the broader, higher plateau of the loving, sympathetic life.

Deep down in the heart of this teacher is a sublime faith which braces and energizes the humblest of his disciples. Here, for example, is a passage which will be a support to many a bewildered solitary soul:

You are a cabin-boy on board a vast ship, of whose very dimensions you are ignorant. But you have your orders to execute at your post. Act, under all circumstances, according to the best light you have, and loyally. Then you will surely be in the line pointed out by Him at the helm. The ship is staunch, the Captain good. You may trust them. No real evil can happen to you or yours. The roughest storm-burst is but an incident of the passage. The will which guides us, and against which nothing shall prevail, is that not one of us should perish. Labor and strive in the sweat of your brow, and then lean on the Eternal. And if sometimes you must say with tears, Thy will be done, because you are wounded and your heart is torn, you will not say it as one overcome by grief and resigned to its domination, but as the vanquished of to-day, sure of future victory.

Pastor Wagner is an enemy of no class or condition of life. He finds simplicity of life among the rich as among the poor, and condemns the craving for the luxuries and ornaments of life, which exists as often in those who do not have them, as the love of them does in those who possess them.

Lively counts for nothing; we must see the heart. Under all the forms in which life vests itself, in all social positions, at the top as at the bottom of the ladder, there are people who live simply, and others who do not. Simplicity is a state of mind. It dwells in the main intention of our lives. A man is simple when his chief care is to be what he ought to be, that is, honestly and naturally human. . . . Let a flower be a flower, a swallow a swallow, a rock a rock, and let a man be a man, and not a fox, a hare, a hog, a bird of prey; this is the sum of the whole matter.

Every age has had its prophets—men who have studied the life of the time, and have spoken the word of reproof and direction. God sends them in his love of humanity, that men may be drawn nearer to him, and become such as he intended and desires them to be. Such a heaven-sent messenger Pastor Wagner appears to be. Like the angel in Bunyan's allegory, he sees men intent on the straws and rubbish they are raking together, and he calls to them to look upward to the crown that is offered them. The word needed to be spoken. It has been uttered in the printed page, and has been widely read. We are soon to hear it from the lips of the gifted speaker, and we may be sure that it will gain in force and impressiveness. The Earthen Vessel, of which Pastor Wagner speaks in the sermon on another page of this issue, which, by the courtesy of his publishers, Messrs. McClure & Phillips, we publish, contains, in his case, a treasure which will surely be appreciated.

THE WINNING OF THE CANADIAN WEST

appointed a few months ago to assume pastoral charge of a new congregation. His arrival was made the occasion of a three days' festival, attended by the Galicians of three townships.

The Baptist, Methodist and Presbyterian churches have also begun work among the Galicians, and by a double campaign of Gospel preaching and house-to-house colportage, are gaining a hold upon them. The New Testament in the Ruthenian language is being widely circulated. In Manitoba College, a class of ten Galician students was formed last January, under the leadership of a Christian graduate of St. Petersburg University, all of whom purpose to become ministers or mission-workers.

Similar work, under conditions and with results very much the same, is being carried on among the Hungarians, Roumanians, Finns, Scandinavians, and Germans, who have settled in various parts of the wide Canadian West. The Gospel goes to them all in very much the same way—by preaching, teaching and colportage. Among some of the colonists, religious work is practically foreign missions, and must remain so until the leaven of education has made itself felt.

In the Canadian West, the English-speaking immigrants from Great Britain, the United States and Eastern Canada, are still a large majority, and among them, therefore, are to be found the most numerous and most active missions. The churches saw, several years ago, that there was danger in the West, with its unlicensed freedom, unless evangelism went hand-in-hand with industrial development, and their policy has been to follow the tide of settlement with mission stations and missionaries. The conditions are in no essential respect different from those in the Western States, between the Mississippi and the Rockies, where the settlers flocked in thousands some forty or fifty years ago, and where home mission work has been carried on, in a variety of forms, by the American churches.

The religious occupation of the Canadian West is one of the great facts in the opening up of that great country. Perhaps nowhere has it ever been more strikingly and practically shown that, in a nation's up-building, the things of the Spirit have a part as well as things material.

THE CITY OF TANGIER, AS SEEN FROM THE BAY

Social Life in Morocco's Capital

As one approaches the city of Tangier from the Sea, he is impressed with its antiquity and its imposing appearance; rising gradually as it does from the water's edge to the summit of the hills on which it is built. The topography suggests a vast amphitheatre, with its surrounding walls and its ancient fortifications.

Tangier is said to be by some the second oldest town in the world. As your ship drops anchor, you are surrounded by numerous natives in their small boats, who are eager to take you to shore. After you are landed, you enter the city, passing through the custom-house, where the Moorish officials await to look through your baggage. Ten per cent. is charged on all goods that are imported into Morocco. As you pass up the street, which is usually swarming with a host of motley humanity—dirty, grotesque, but all very interesting to the newcomer—you find the streets very narrow—from six to twelve feet wide. The houses are built of stone, and whitewashed, and many of them look like square, white monuments. They are flat on top, with no cornice. The doors are arched, and the floors of many are laid with colored flagstones, porcelain squares, red tiles, and broad bricks, that wear a long time.

In the streets, amid the swarms, one meets the Bedouins, the Moors, and the Sahareens, who are known by the blackness of their skins. Amongst the throng are found many European traders, and missionaries from England, Germany, and America, working for the extension of Christ's Kingdom in this land. Moorish women are enveloped in white robes, from head to foot, leaving just a little opening at the head to see as they go along the road. They are not allowed to look at the men of their race in public, nor to be looked at by them.

Curious little stores line both sides of the streets, kept by merchants, shoemakers, fruit and produce vendors of different kinds. The keeper usually sits on the floor, and reaches, without rising, for any article you may want. The Moors despise Christians, yet tolerate

The city of Tangier has many beggars and cripples of all sorts. They lie upon the ground and cry out for alms; they crawl about on hands and feet, holding their hands and crying aloud to every passer-by for help, "in the name of God," or of some dead saint. Snake-charmers, with their shining pets, beguile groups of men and children, who watch them for hours in the open market-place.

The Moor's Sabbath is on Friday. About noon he goes to the mosque, removing his shoes at the door, and performing his ablutions. Then he goes through the form of kneeling, rising, pressing his forehead to the pavement at times, and saying his prayers, and goes back to work.

There are now missionaries at work in nearly all the larger towns in Morocco, and also in some of the inland towns, preaching the Gospel by word and life the blessed Gospel of the Son of God. Continue to pray for their success in saving souls. May the Lord continue to use the CHRISTIAN HERALD in the future as in the past to encourage those who labor in the dark corners and outposts in heathen lands.

Your kind letter of February 10, with twenty dollars enclosed to use for our work, is at hand, and we thank you and the readers of the CHRISTIAN HERALD for remembering us with this offering. The blessing of the Lord is manifested in the missionaries and the people, and the work moves on against the opposition of Mohammedanism which prevails in this land. Mohammedans and Jews have been baptized by the workers who are laboring in this city, within the last six weeks. It is a great pleasure to sit in the convocations and listen to the singing of the converts.

Tangier, Morocco.

FREDERICK WEI

AMERICAN MISSIONARIES AND THEIR FAMILIES IN MOROCCAN COSTUME

From the Holy City

JERUSALEM, March 13, 1904. I have now been here in Palestine over three months, and while I did not come here for sight-seeing, yet I have seen much that has deeply interested me in the Holy City. I have remained in and around Jerusalem most of the time. I have encircled her walls, told the towers thereof, and "marked well her bulwarks." I have now a more extended knowledge of the Holy City than I have ever had before, and its sacredness in connection with the home-life of Christ.

I have made Jerusalem my quiet residence during the entire winter; enjoyed the glorious sunrise of morning's early dawn, and the noon-tide glory and gorgeous sunsets—the afterglow more superbly beautiful than I have ever seen anywhere.

Intermediate with this outlook, I have carefully penetrated the lines of Christian work and looked on the faces of many of the laborers in the Master's vineyard, to note if the vine yielded her fruit. The observation shows promise of success in the near future.

My own heart-felt desire in coming to this "Garden of our Lord" has been that I might be a helper, and at the same time accomplish something by individual effort, especially among the little people. If I have had a supreme thought, it was to organize a kindergarten, practical and useful as an industry, so that youth might respond to its Bible object lessons, and in its maturity become a power all over this land. The first work I have become intensely interested in is a school for little blind girls, under the supervision of an excellent English lady, who has been training these children of darkness for years, so that now the older girls are fitted to teach the smaller ones. All are bright and intelligent, and while the all-Father, who is too wise to err, has allowed obscurity of eyesight, he has given them keen perception in their other senses and rare delicacy of touch. It is remarkable how much they accomplish with their little fingers, reading the raised Arabic letters of the Holy Bible, which this good lady teaches them daily. She is an adept in this art. I consider it a great pleasure to assist her, and be associated with these little ones in speaking and reading English with them. It has been my privilege to organize them as King's Daughters, and to instruct them from the 45th Psalm. They have sweet voices for song, and are learning hymns for Palm and Easter. I have purchased material to make them pretty Easter dresses.

March 13 was a red-letter Sabbath. An American lady, Mrs. Abbie C. Morrow, dedicated her new home for destitute orphans here in Jerusalem. It would be interesting could I reproduce the address, in which she gave her experience of Divine leading to do this work, and told how God had set his seal to it.

That Jerusalem should be chosen as the place for the gathering of so great a number of Sunday School teachers and workers at the approaching World's Sunday School Convention, ought to enlist the intercessory prayers of Christians the wide world over, that it may become a Pentecostal power. The committee of arrangements have provided ample hotel entertainment for guests, and have left out no item, from beginning to end, in this grand undertaking. The location for the spreading of the huge tent is a favorable one.

Hundreds and thousands of pilgrims are coming daily to attend the double Easters (Latin and Greek) which are in advance of the date of the Convention. EVANGEL.

What a Little Hindu Orphan Did

From Mrs. R. Winsor, wife of the American missionary at Sirur, India, we have received a letter telling of Jai Narayan, a little Hindu orphan girl of thirteen years, who has taught thirty or more other little Hindu girls the words and music of hymns translated into their own tongue, and the little ones can carry them through delightfully.

A Torpedo in Flight

Military and naval experts cite the recent victories of the Japanese on the sea, as showing that the day of the battleship and cruiser is passing, as they are almost defenseless against the attacks of torpedoes. No matter how strongly constructed, or how powerful may be their armament, they can be sunk by the explosion of a single projectile. The submarine torpedo boat is such a terrible factor in warfare, that in future a government will consider well any step which leads it into hostilities, since by the use of such craft not only whole navies can be annihilated, but shipping of every kind destroyed. The torpedoes contain explosives so powerful that nothing has thus far been invented to resist the impact of such missiles.

HOW A TORPEDO APPEARS AS IT LEAVES THE TUBE

RUSSIA'S NAVAL DISASTER

RUSSIA'S Port Arthur fleet, which, since the opening of the war, has been greatly weakened by repeated attacks by Japan's stronger navy, on April 13 suffered an irretrievable loss in the sinking of the battleship Petrovavlovsk, the gallant Vice-Admiral Makaroff, with his whole naval staff, and nearly seven hundred men going down with the ship. This, while hailed in Tokio as a victory for Japan, is to Russia a frightful disaster, which has sickened the Czar and his advisers, and plunged the whole nation into gloom.

On the night of the 12th, Admiral Makaroff had sent several vessels out on a scout-expedition in heavy weather. Next morning, the Admiral himself went out of the harbor with the Petrovavlovsk and five other warships, including the Pobieda, having been informed that Admiral Togo's fleet had been sighted, and wishing to ascertain the enemy's position. After he had been out for an hour or more, the Japanese fleet, some thirty in number, and including battleships, cruisers and torpedo craft, was seen approaching, and the Russian vessels, being so greatly inferior in numerical strength, were ordered to withdraw to shelter under the guns of the forts.

They were retiring in good order, though the weather was rough and boisterous. According to the Russian official account, Admiral Makaroff, at 8 A. M. sat down in his cabin to breakfast with Rear Admiral Molas, while the wardroom nearby was crowded with officers seated at the tables. At 8.30, and when the Petrovavlovsk was still two miles outside the harbor entrance, a terrific explosion occurred. The battleship was suddenly lifted up almost clear of the water and then hurled forward with such tremendous force that the whole ship was flooded. Below, everything was wreckage and debris, the explosion having apparently torn the bottom out of the warship. She swayed and reeled fearfully a moment or two, and then heeled over, "turned turtle," filled and sank within five minutes after the first impact.

Admiral Makaroff, Rear Admiral Molas, his chief of staff, and the other officers, are said to have been torn well nigh to fragments by the terrific force of the explosion. Almost the entire crew, men and officers, were between decks at their posts by the guns, ready for the expected action with the enemy, and so far as is known all who were below perished. On the upper deck of the flagship were Grand Duke Cyril, a few officers, and about two score men. When the ship struck, Lieut. Von Kobe, an aide, shouted to the Grand Duke to "leap into the sea!" and the next instant, the entire group, including Cyril, found themselves struggling in the waves, having been flung violently overboard by the explosion. The Grand Duke, though severely injured in the face, neck and legs, managed to keep afloat until he was picked up. Seven other officers and thirty-two men were saved, being more or less injured. Captain Jakovleff, the commander of the ill-fated flagship, who was on deck, was dashed against a stanchion and killed. The survivors were taken ashore at Golden Hill.

It is not known whether the mine which caused the destruction of the flagship and the loss of seven hundred lives, was one that had been set by the Russians and which had become displaced, or if it was a Japanese mine. During a demonstration by Admiral Togo's fleet on a previous day, a number of new mines were planted across the outer entrance to the harbor, and Tokio dispatches claim that it was unquestionably one of these that sunk the battleship. Naval officers at St. Petersburg believe that Japan may have used a submarine boat in the attack. It is said there are four such vessels in the Japanese Navy.

Rear Admiral Uriu seems to have united his squadron with that of Togo, and in a report received at Tokio, the former gives a somewhat different version of the event from that furnished by the Russian naval officials. Admiral Uriu states that the Japanese attacked Port Arthur at daylight on the 13th, shelling the forts, and that they "succeeded in sinking a battleship and one torpedo destroyer. The Japanese sustained no losses." A Times correspondent on the dispatch boat Haimun, who witnessed the bombardment, cables that it began at 9.45 A. M., in squally weather, twelve Japanese warships participating. On nearing the port, they were joined by six more Japanese warships. After a demonstration rather than a bombardment, the fleet withdrew. Including the torpedo craft, the Japanese fleet numbered nearly forty vessels in all. From the dispatch boat no Russian ships were visible. This account is supplemented by a dispatch from Chefoo, stating that the main Japanese squadron returned to the attack and the Russian ships were seen coming out of the harbor.

Japanese torpedo boats succeeded in detaching the Russian destroyer Bezstrashai from the squadron, and five of them surrounded and sunk her with torpedoes, forty-five of her crew of fifty being lost. The Russian ships, being so largely outnumbered, were retiring, when the Petrovavlovsk was seen by the Japanese to explode and founder, having struck a mine. Her boilers exploded, carrying the ship into the air. A great column of water and smoke shot up, and the vessel disappeared almost immediately, leaving not a trace on the surface of the bay. The Russian battleship Pobieda also struck a mine while maneuvering, and sustained considerable damage, but escaped to the harbor under her own steam, without loss of life. At this time, the Japanese were beyond the range of the forts. The Russian four-funneled cruiser Bayan was for a time in danger of being cut off, and was attacked by three Japanese cruisers, but managed to regain the protection of the forts. During the engagement, the Japanese reports state, the only casualty on the attacking fleet was one man wounded.

The loss of the brave Makaroff, with his staff and flagship, is the heaviest blow Russia has suffered since the war began. It is said that all the plans of the naval campaign which he had been discussing with his staff in his cabin shortly before the explosion, went down with him.

St. Petersburg is prostrated by this fresh disaster, and the whole nation mourns for Makaroff, who was a universal favorite. A memorial service was held in the Admiralty Church at the capital, at which 20,000 persons stood reverently with bared heads, the crowds filling the streets near the church. The Czar attended and was bowed with grief. The Dowager Empress embraced Madame Makaroff, the Admiral's widow, throughout the service, and at its conclusion the Emperor kissed Madame Makaroff's hand.

It is understood that Vice-Admiral Skrydloff will succeed to the command of the Port Arthur fleet.

The lost Petrovavlovsk was of 10,960 tons displacement, and cost $5,490,000. She was one of the finest vessels in Russia's navy, and was launched in St. Petersburg in 1898. She carried four 12-inch guns, twelve 6-inch guns, thirty-four smaller guns, and six torpedo tubes. Her horse-power was 14,213, and her speed seventeen knots. She had a crew of 700 men.

Port Arthur is now reported to be completely isolated. Not only is the harbor entrance tightly blocked for larger vessels, but even the smaller craft will have difficulty in navigating the narrow channel, in the middle of which lies the sunken flagship. It is said that the railroad to Yinkow has been cut, and that all telegraph wires are destroyed. This is probably the prelude to the last scene in the dramatic story of Port Arthur's defense against overwhelming odds. Rear Admiral Oukhtomsky is provisionally in command of all that remains of the Russian fleet. Should the Japanese push their advantage now, it would seem that the fort, with its fleet crippled and its forts dismantled, could no longer be capable of successful resistance.

In Korea, the campaign has been marked by frequent skirmishes along the Yalu River. Twenty Japanese were captured by Russian cavalry in one of these brushes, and in another a Japanese outpost repulsed a company of Russian infantry, killing twenty-two men. A party of men under Lieut. Yamaguchi, from the Japanese warship Kaimon, had a sharp fight with several boatloads of Russians belonging to a cavalry patrol on the Yalu, on April 11, finally driving them inland.

St. Petersburg has news that the attempt by the Japanese to land its second army in Manchuria has been repulsed. The dispatch states that Admiral Togo's fleet escorted a large number of transports to a point west of the Yalu River. Nearby, a force of Russians was concealed, and 12,000 Japanese had landed before the presence of the enemy was detected. Heavy losses were inflicted upon the Japanese by the Russian fire and the former were driven back to their ships. There is no news from the Japanese side concerning this rumored engagement.

Smallpox has broken out in the Russian camp at Liao-yang, where there are 100 cases a day.

Russia has notified the various governments, including the United States, that newspaper correspondents using wireless telegraphy will be treated as spies and shot, and that vessels provided with wireless apparatus will be treated as lawful prizes. This unusual notification may call out a protest from several quarters, and will probably be a subject of diplomatic correspondence.

The new Anglo-French agreement may have a powerful influence on the situation in the Far East. It is hoped by the leading statesmen of both France and England that the opportunity may soon arrive, if not for intervention, at least for the "friendly and conciliatory suggestion of a settlement" between Russia and Japan.

Corea's Royal Palace Burned

On April 15th, the imperial palace at Seoul, Corea, was destroyed by fire, which originated from the heating apparatus in the new audience hall. All the imperial buildings within the walled enclosure were burned. The loss is placed at about $500,000. The hall of records, with its valuable contents, and the new electric lighting plant were burned. The Emperor escaped to the library, outside the walled enclosure, where the court is temporarily established. He contemplates returning to the old palace, which has not been occupied since the murder of the Queen, but it is possible that the court will be established at the Russian Legation building, that place having been vacant since the departure of M. Pavloff, the Russian Minister. American marines, at the request of the Emperor, are guarding the library. Among the valuables saved were the imperial seals. No lives were lost, and the American Legation was not harmed. Our government has directed Mr. Allen, the American Minister at Seoul, to express the President's sympathy to the Korean government.

The Exposition Travelers' Aid Committee

WITH the above comprehensive title, this committee has begun operations. It includes in its membership the International Board of the Young Women's Christian Association, the American Committee affiliated with the World's Christian Associations, the Girls' Friendly Societies, the Council of Jewish Women, the Women's Christian Temperance Union, and other well-known organizations, which will be named hereafter.

In the next issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, very full particulars of the work, as it is planned to save our young women from danger at St. Louis, will be given. Centrally located headquarters in New York City will be announced at an early date, and a resident secretary will be installed, to whom all communications may be addressed.

To carry on this large work, money will be needed. Any contributions sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, whether large or small, will be received and acknowledged.

Makaroff

IN the death of Stepan Osipovitch Makaroff, Russia loses its bravest and most heroic figure in the present war and the Russian people their popular idol. An end so tragical for one who was so universally beloved for his splendid courage and brilliant deeds, could not fail to touch every heart in the Czar's dominions, where loyalty to the throne and to duty is a part of the national religion.

In the present instance, the disaster is probably all the more acutely felt because it was not wholly unexpected. Vice-Admiral Makaroff was bold even to rashness, and the Czar and others who knew the Commander best, had misgivings that his intrepidity might lead him into serious peril. He possessed that high spirit of daring which disdains danger and would stake all on the issue of a single adventure. To him the game of battle was a game to be played to the end, whatever the consequences. So well were these characteristics known, and so fraught with possibilities of danger was the command of this "Cossack of the sea," as the Russian people admiringly called Makaroff, that the Emperor is said to have seriously entertained a plan to relieve him of the supreme command of the fleet, lest it might be jeopardized, or even cast away through his boldness. Yet it is the bold thought, crystallized into action that wins, and had not his flagship met disaster in an accident which proved a calamity for Russia, the sea rover, whose courage inspired Port Arthur's defenders, might have continued to challenge the admiration of the world by his gallant defense, and might have saved to Russia the Liao-tung peninsula and the Gibraltar of Asia, which now seem destined to pass into the hands of her Asiatic rival.

Wholly apart from the merit of the cause for which he lived, and fought, and died—and which to him was doubtless the most sacred of all causes—the career of Makaroff is one that would attract attention in any land. From his youth trained to the sea, he rose solely by his courage and his instant readiness for every emergency. He knew how to grasp at opportunities. His viking heart was not always turned to thoughts of war, for the sailor-patriot was a man of science, an inventor, hydrographer and explorer, by turns. One of the finest of his "peace victories" he always held to be his invention of the ice-breaker Ermack, on which he twice visited the Polar seas.

In his last command, he knew the danger, he accepted the risk, and he paid the penalty. His life, at this juncture, was of more value to Russia than many battleships, and his loss would seem to be well-nigh irreparable. Yet there is little doubt that he died as he would have chosen to die, with his foot upon his own ship's deck, amid the din of battle and the blinding smoke of the guns. Russia will long remember him as a hero of the type that never grows old, and which will continue to command the admiration of men until that day comes when wars shall cease, and the madness of the battle shall be known no more.

Clerical Union on Divorce

OUR Legislatures having failed to adopt uniform measures to correct the rapidly increasing evil of divorce, and there being little probability of relief through Congressional action, the effort of Bishop Doane to secure the united action of clergymen of his own and other churches, meets with general approval. It proposes to pledge the ministers to a refusal to celebrate a marriage when either of the parties has been divorced for trivial causes, or for having committed an offence justifying divorce. It is obvious that the clergy can do nothing to check the prevalence of divorce, but they can at least take a stand which will express the opinion of religious people on the subject. It will still be possible for divorced persons to marry again, by going to a civil authority, but if this united action becomes general, they will no longer be able to boast that their new union has the sanction of the Church. That will be a clear gain, because it will place the marriage where it belongs—in the secular and not in the religious sphere. The legal status will be assured, and all social rights will be protected, but the religious approval of the union will be withheld. Doubtless, many of the couples who are thus deprived of religious sanction to their union, will care nothing for the loss; but to others it will be a serious deprivation, implying a stigma. The fact of a religious teacher refusing to solemnize a marriage, will practically express his conviction that it is contrary to God's law, and will thus operate as a warning that the parties to the union have no right to expect God's blessing.

It must be noted that the attitude of the clergy will not operate directly to reduce the number of divorces. They have nothing to say against persons obtaining divorces for any causes recognized by the law of the State. Their action is limited to declining to solemnize a new marriage in such cases. A person who has been divorced, and is prepared to live a celibate life afterwards, will therefore not be affected by this urged action of the clergy. It is, however, notorious, that many divorces are obtained for the direct object of marrying some other person, and thus the new union is tainted before it is formed, by the very sin which it scathingly denounced. Persons who, being married, have allowed an unholy passion to find a lodgment in their hearts, and obtain a divorce in order to gratify it, are a curse to society, and it will be well if they realize that an obstacle is placed in their way. The obstacle may be one easily surmounted, but the fact of its existing at all, is an indication of the clergyman's view of the category to which the marriage belongs.

It may be presumed that the attitude of the clergy will not affect the liberty of the innocent party in a divorce. That party ought to have the privilege of marrying. It would be unreasonable and unjust to punish the sufferer for an offence not his own. If he or she had to choose between an association with a wicked partner, or of lifelong celibacy, we can imagine the alternative being very painful. No such alternative ought to be forced upon any innocent party. The wrongdoing of another ought not to bring a penalty on the one who is wronged. The wronged partner in a marriage has the right to freedom from bonds that have been cruelly polluted, and, with the freedom, ought to have the right of contracting another marriage. It is the one who has done the wrong who should bear the penalty, and that fact will doubtless be recognized by the clergy.

The chief benefit to be hoped for from the standpoint proposed to be taken, is the view of marriage as a sacred and solemn association, which it implies. The light and frivolous spirit in which many young people enter into matrimony needs to be reformed. They ought no longer to have the idea, that if a marriage proves ungenial it will be easy to obtain a divorce and marry some one else. The attitude of the clergy should impress upon them, if nothing else, the view that in the sight of God and of the Church, a marriage union is an association for life, the dissolution of which cannot be justified by caprice or temper, but only by the commission of a crime base and revolting in the last degree.

The Missouri Explosion

Copyright, 1904, by Guseford

CAPT. WM. S. COWLES

SINCERE sorrow was caused throughout the country on April 13, by news of the disaster on board the United States Battleship Missouri. The vessel was at target practice off Pensacola, Florida, in company with the Texas and the Brooklyn, when an explosion occurred in her turret, followed by a second explosion in the room below, where the ammunition was being prepared for hoisting. Twenty-nine officers and men were killed instantly, and five others were badly injured, of whom three have since died. The exact cause of the accident is not known, owing to the fact that those who witnessed it were killed. There was a competition of the crews for a record of quick and accurate firing of the huge twelve inch guns. Several rounds had been fired on the Missouri, and another charge was being driven into the breech of a gun, when it exploded. The flame passed through the open trap-door, through which the ammunition is raised by an elevator to the breech of the gun, and exploded four charges of two hundred pounds each, which were being placed in readiness, for firing. The officers, realizing how close this latter explosion was to the great magazine, in which the store of ammunition is kept, feared that it might blow up, involving the destruction of the ship. The door of the magazine was standing open, but an officer, named Monson, sprang instantly, at the risk of being blown to pieces, and slammed the door after him. His prompt action probably saved the lives of all on board. Capt. Cowles, who was in command of the ship, averted her danger by flooding the magazine, almost drowning Monson, who was inside. Two theories have been offered in explanation of the accident. One is, that the wind blew the flame of the previous discharge back through the muzzle of the gun to the powder being forced in at the breech. The second theory is that some portion of the powder in which the powder is enclosed had remained burning in the gun when the next charge was inserted. Either of these might have caused the explosion. Primarily it was due to the speed with which the gun was being fired. Navy experts have become convinced that in engagement at sea, the victory will go to the side that fires most rapidly and accurately, even though on the side there may be a smaller number of ships than the enemy has. Efforts have, therefore, been made to increase speed in firing, and a record of thirty-eight rounds between discharges has been made. The risk involved in such rapid firing is enormous, and there can be little doubt that to it is due this disaster. While the loss of life is deplorable, there is reason for thankfulness that, through the heroism of Monson and other officers, it was not worse. Had the magazine exploded, or had the vessel been beached, as was proposed in the panic that ensued after the explosion, the vessel would probably have been a total loss. So long as war continues, it is necessary to be prepared for eventualities, and it is a patriotic duty to make the means as efficient as possible; but what a relief it will be when that time, promised to the world, arrives, when it will no longer be necessary to have these death-dealing instruments of warfare, which, as this disaster shows, may be as destructive to the users as to an enemy.

They shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more (Isa. 2:4).

A Noble Waiter

A romantic story is told of a recent marriage, by a Brooklyn journal. It states that a girl employed in a department store in that city, made the acquaintance of an Italian some years ago. He was introduced to her by some friends who lived in the house where he boarded. As the acquaintance became more intimate, her parents objected, but the Italian succeeded in convincing them that he was a man of good family, and of irreproachable moral character. He was employed as a waiter in a restaurant, but he said that he should soon obtain work more suited to his education, and had simply taken that occupation until he could obtain a reference, and learn more of the country. The girl's parents made further inquiries, and became satisfied that the man was respectable, and of good character. He soon made his way, and having good wages, proposed marriage. The wedding took place, and the man continued to work hard, and supported his wife respectably. One evening, on his return home, his wife handed him a letter from Italy, which had been delivered during the day. He was much agitated on reading it, and told her that he had a secret to disclose. The name by which he was known was assumed, and he was really the Count Ferreri. He had become very poor in his native country, and had emigrated; but not wishing to degrade an ancient title, he had taken another name. The letter he had just read informed him that a large estate in Italy had become his by the failure disintegration does not depend upon the quantity existent. It would all vanish, whether it measured a cubic inch or a cubic mile, forming in the process other substances, the only one at present known being helium. It is obvious, therefore, that radium must now be in the course of production. If it had been an original deposit it would have disappeared long ago. It was the merest speculation to discuss how it was produced. Professor Ramsay paid a tribute to Professor Baskerville, of the University of North Carolina, who, a few days ago, announced in New York, his discovery of two new elements, carolinium and berzelium. The announcement is a genuine surprise, but it confirms the opinion of scientists have long held, that new developments in nature are continually taking place. Everything on earth changes and disappears. A gigantic ancient statue was found in an Asiatic desert, on which was inscribed, "My name is Ozymandias, king of kings; look on my works, ye mortals and despair." The king's works and the very memory of his name had perished. So it appears it is with the very elements, some of which prove to be merely phenomena, and only in God is there permanence.

They shall perish, but thou remainest, and they all shall wax old as doth a garment; but thou art the same, and thy years shall not fail (Heb. 1:11).

A Fight for a Life

An anxious struggle, continuing through four days and nights, was carried on at Boonton, N. J., to save the life of a diver, who had been caught and held firmly at the bottom of the dam by the suction of the water. A huge sluice pipe runs through the dam, in which there is a gate to regulate the flow of water. Something went wrong with the gate, which prevented its closing or opening. It was necessary, in order to fix the valve, to shut off the flow of water. To do this, a large wooden ball, weighted with lead, was sunk, in the hope that the suction would carry it to the mouth of the sluice pipe. It did so, partially, but one end of the cable was between the ball and the mouth of the pipe, and through that aperture the water rushed in a mighty stream. A diver was sent down with sandbags, with which he tried to close the opening. Very soon after his descent, his signals showed that he was in trouble. Another diver went to his rescue, and reported that one of the man's legs had been caught between the ball and the mouth of the pipe, and held fast. All efforts to release him failed. A cable was tied around his body and carried to the shore, and a horse tugger at the other end, but the man was held immovable under 60 ft. of water. For more than eight hours it was believed by his signals that he was still living and if he was, it would depend on his being supplied with fresh air by pumps whether he continued to live. Accordingly, day and night, the pumps were kept at work and a physician was on hand at all hours to give instant attention, if he was brought up alive. One diver after another descended, but none could release him. Hope gradually failed, but still, on the mere chance of his being alive, fresh air was pumped to him. It was not until an expert machinist went down and repaired the machinery that the suction was relieved and the man was brought up. He had been under water four days and nights and was quite dead. The result did not surprise the watchers; but until the very last there had been no relaxation in the efforts to save him. Would that there was the same anxiety and energy displayed to save souls that are in danger of eternal death!

Let him know that he who converteth the sinner from the error of his way shall save a soul from death (James 5:20)

Radium to Disappear

A cable message from London to a New York journal, reports an interview with Sir William Ramsay, in which he is represented as declaring that radium, instead of being a primeval substance, is merely a temporary phase of matter, an unstable resting point in a series of transmutations, of which nobody knows the beginning, or end, or meaning. Experiments made by himself and Professor Soddy tend to show that it would all disintegrate and vanish in the course of time. The rate of

Our Household Circle

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

KEEPING THINGS UP

SOME years ago, a Southern city awoke one morning to find chalked on its pavement, or boldly written in a big hand on its walls, these enigmatic words: JACK CAN FIX IT. Naturally people rubbed their eyes and looked again, and when they discovered the legend continually repeated, they began to make inquiries. Who, pray, is Jack? What can Jack fix? Where is Jack to be seen? A day or two later Jack answered the last query, by a new set of personal advertisements, with the added information that he lived at a certain number in a certain street. He proved to be an enterprising young man, unable to get a job, but with a turn for tinkering broken things, and for mechanical work, carpentry and the like. Not wishing to be dependent on his family, "Jack" fitted up a tiny workshop in an unused woodshed, scattered his unique notes broadly over the town, and awaited customers. They came by ones, twos, and threes, and in time by scores. "Jack" built up a flourishing trade.

The quality of taking the initiative is one of the essentials to success. Many a man, and woman, too, who to-day wants to earn a little money, and add to a not over-heavy purse, could hit on something new or old, for which others would gladly pay, if he or she had but that quality, and added to it some originality.

The person who should devote his talents to going about any town, doing needed repairs, keeping things up for householders at a small rate of expense, would not fail of earning a decent livelihood. For example, in a suburban village, where in a real estate boom a few years ago, a number of cottages were run up cheaply, with an eye to picturesque effect rather than to solidity, householders are constantly annoyed by sagging doors, breaking window-cords, and a variety of small bothers which a clever workman can set right without much trouble. Windows need puttying over, paint is wanted here and there, and the suburban landlord, haughty as a baron of the Middle Ages, simply refuses to assist tenants, or quietly ignores their gently repeated pleas for aid. If there is a man of the house, he may or may not be handy in keeping things mended. If the household be exclusively of women, they are not equal to most of the small bits of outside work that a man does with ease, if he knows how to use tools. So in the suburbs, the itinerant or resident general utility man, would be as welcome as the robins when they come in the spring.

Every house that presents a good appearance inside and out, must be kept up. Paint must be renewed, fences mended, loose boards replaced in porch or walk, the whole place maintained in tidiness and good order. Equally with furniture and carpets. The worn part of the bedroom carpet must be taken from the floor space that shows, and hidden under the bed. The curtains that are torn must be mended. A gentlewoman who can darn, and mend, and take a stitch in time, will impart to her house and her family a convincing air of prosperity, unknown to the household where the mother has no such faculty, or is idle or incapable.

The art of keeping things up is one for the housewife to cultivate with assiduity. Either individually, or by proxy, she must see that things do not go to pieces, are not neglected, and are shown at their best.

Rights and Privileges of the Home

If we were just a bit more careful about the rights of others in the home, many of us would be a good deal more happy than we are. For example, in some houses nobody owns anything. Like the early Christians, the family possess all things in common. The result is that the long-suffering mother can seldom be sure of finding a clean handkerchief in her drawer, even though she may have put away a neat pile after the weekly washing was done. Jane helps herself to Susan's stocks and belts, Mary seizes upon collars and cuffs wherever she can find them, and Robert unhesitatingly despoils the chiffonier that belongs to his brother Jim. A mother told me the other day that her half-grown sons were forever fighting over their clothing, as they were so nearly of a size that they could wear each other's things without the least trouble. In consequence, she was usually worn out with adjusting disputes. An old person often has a liking for a particular chair or a particular window, and is not a little disturbed if some heedless boy or girl flop down in her place, without so much as saying by your leave. A little attention to rights, would, in many cases, result in the granting of privileges, which are often denied.

AN EARLY MORNING FLOWER MARKET

Union Square, New York City, is a busy place during the very early morning hours in the spring. Here congregate the venders of flowering plants and shrubs, each vieing with the other in arranging their stock in the most attractive manner. Bright scarlet geraniums; roses of all kinds, from the delicate "Tea" variety, with its pinkish-yellow half opened buds, and its delicious perfume, to the hardy "Rambler," with its countless clusters of white, pink, yellow, and crimson blooms. Here a velvety "Jack" in high-bred opulence of fragrance and coloring, nestles close among masses of gorgeous pansies, that in turn neighbor most kindly with the starry blue-eyed "Forget-me-nots." English daisies in pink and white innocence, modestly put forth their claims to notice, while all around, amid these groupings of beauty, one hears the song of praise from these mute singers. The men and women who buy, must carry away their purchases, as there is no system of delivery, and every other man or woman one meets in this vicinity in the early morning, carries a pot of some kind, the blossoms nodding to the happy look on the purchaser's face. By the time that the solid business men are on their way down town, all vestige of the flower market has been removed, and Union Square is the same old friend, with its green grass, its fountain, trees, and benches, along the walks.

As to Spring Moving

FORTUNATE are those readers who do not have to move in the spring. The roof that covers them is their own; they have summered and wintered for years under its friendly shelter. They are country people and strike their roots deeply into the soil. City folk are the modern nomads, flitting from bough to bough like birds, or pulling up stakes like soldiers on the march. To dwell in city apartment houses, the home is a temporary camp. Any little objection, such as a too musical neighbor on the top floor, or one with a cross baby on the floor below, one who keeps a parrot across the hall, or a man with a crutch tapping round on the wood floors, will decide the flat-tenants to move. A niggardly landlord, a boish janitor, a dumbwaiter that creaks, the inconvenience of any kind whatever is enough to send a New Yorker in search of another abode. Indeed, a witty book called The Van Dwellers, is wholly devoted to the adventures of a family who are always moving from one home to another.

In the suburbs, Americans play the game of "Puss in the Corner" every April or May. One man fancies dampness in his cellar; his neighbor has a furnace that did not heat the house in zero weather, and the people across the way cannot depend on their range to bake muffins for breakfast. So, with the utmost gusto they all change places. Mr. H. takes the cottage of Mr. Y. Mr. Q. slips into Mr. H's former quarters, and Mr. Y. moves his goods and chattels into the abandoned domicile of the Q's.

There is a good deal of fuss and expense, but on the whole, the efforts of the chronic nomads are crowned with success. In the village your house always has something that mine lacks, a cupola, a bay window, a porch, a driveway, that make me break the ten commandments whenever I call on you, and my house always awakened your envy, because I have ample closets, or a sunnier outlook, or a more extensive view than yours enjoys.

Spring moving invariably convinces us that we are both richer and poorer than we fancied. Quantities of things that we long been lost come to light when we are packing. Quantities of other things are marred and broken. But, on the whole, if we move we must, we take the road with real cheer.

The grass beside the singing brook
Is tossing in the breeze.
The robins in the branches,
The bees among the flowers,
Are making merry music now
In these enchanting hours.

But, prettiest sight of spring-time
That makes an old heart young
And sets to silver chiming
The bells of memory rung,
Is Baby's dainty carriage
With freight so brave and sweet
The equipage with the right of way
Upon the village street.

The king may drive in splendor,
The ten-times millionaire
May lean on silken cushions,
And half forget his care.
But Baby is a monarch
Too rich to dream of gold;
And all earth's proudest sceptres
His dimpled fingers hold.

So down the street the Baby
Goes rolling in his pride;
And none his throne shall dare assail,
And none his crown deride.
What time the bees are humming
What time the robins sing,
Comes Baby in his carriage
A robed and sceptred king.

Extravagant Women

Women are accused of extravagance most unjustly. See men are extravagant. Some are penurious. So are some men. To be penurious is to spend your time in foot-hoarding, to refuse to give alms, and to get less from your income than you ought. To be extravagant is to willfully live beyond your means, to buy things you don't need. The extravagance of women is checked in most cases by the limitations of their pocket-books. Wealthy women, as for example, Mrs. Phebe Hearst, or Miss Helen Gould, show themselves admirable financiers, and while they bestow their means most generously, they never incur the stigma of recklessness or improvidence.

Our Children's Temple at Mont-Lawn

It is with unusual gratification that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to-day presents to its readers the architects' drawing of the beautiful "Children's Temple," to be erected at our Mont-Lawn Home this summer. Thousands of our friends all over the Union are interested in the work which this journal has conducted among the tenement children during the last ten years. They have helped it work, year after year, with their gifts and their prayers; and now that it is to be crowned by a picturesque, roomy chapel—a veritable "Children's Temple"—they will be doubly interested in all that is done for the spiritual welfare of our little guests at the Home hereafter.

Many years ago, before the establishment of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home at Mont-Lawn, Nyack-on-the-Hudson, the Rev. Mr. Jewett, who then owned the property, built a little chapel on the south side of the road, opposite his residence. In this simple little wooden chapel, for a number of years our tenement children have gathered, season after season, their fresh, young voices ringing in songs of gladness, their faces beaming with the joy of living amid such beautiful surroundings. How happy they were in making the interior of the little church beautiful with fresh flowers, and branches gathered from that greater temple, God's Out-of-Doors. Busy little hands trimmed garlands and wreaths to be draped and hung about, until the place seemed like a flower.

Here were gathered, from time to time, children representing many nationalities. German, Irish, Swedes, Syrians, Armenians, and Italians; representatives of so many creeds and denominations—meaning so little to the children—united in the sweet songs of the Gospel and in daily worship.

More than 22,000 children have spent many happy hours within the walls of the little wooden chapel. For some years it has, however, been entirely inadequate as to size, and it also began to show signs of serious dilapidation, and threatened to become unsafe for occupancy.

Dr. Klopsch, to whom all that relates to the Children's Home is very dear, contributed 2,000 life subscriptions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at $10 each, to defray the expense of erecting a new and suitable building for our little Mont-Lawn summer waifs, and in May ground will be broken and work begun on the Children's Temple. It will be built on the south side of the highway, so that from its site can be seen all the buildings connected with the Children's Home. There will be three entrances, approached by paved walks. The principal entrance will be in the centre, a tower rising immediately over the hooded porch. The exterior design is well suited to the location, being very picturesque. The walls to the eaves are to be of field-stone, with brownstone trimmings around the openings. Most of the openings are arched with stone, and all windows opening on the auditorium are to be glazed with leaded stained glass.

The auditorium will seat three hundred people; the seats arranged in concentric rows, centering on the pulpit, back of which is the organ chamber. The grounds around the Children's Temple will be nicely laid out with plants and shrubs, and in time vines will creep up and around the walls.

The plans have been made, and the construction will be supervised by M. L. & H. G. Emery, architects, New York. It is the purpose of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to have services in the Temple throughout the year for the benefit of the residents in the neighborhood of Mont-Lawn. Once open, the doors of the Temple, we hope, will never be closed on Sunday thereafter, and that the Gospel of Jesus, the friend of the children, may be preached there every week. This will be a great boon to many families who, during winter weather, find it difficult to attend church in the village below, as the distance is considerable.

"GOD KNOWS BEST!"

By CHARLES NOEL DOUGLAS

I REMEMBER the time in my earlier days, when I used to be worried in mind, O'er the way that God had of directing the spheres, and ruling o'er all human kind;
I would think over this, and study o'er that, for 'twas all a great mystery to me,
And then I'd decide, that God's ways they were not just all that God's ways ought to be.
Impetuous youth it will question, aye, yes! and even at times 'twill condemn,
The ways of the great Jehovah himself, though his ways are beyond mortal ken;
But ah, when the years they have ripened the mind,
and life's evening shadows they fall,
Then we're free to confess, as we ask God to bless, that
'twas he who knew best after all.

I have looked in the eyes of an agonized wife, as a wee little life ebbed away,
I have felt in my breast the turmoil and strife, as we gazed on the poor silent clay;
I have felt fierce rebellion sweep up in my soul, as I yearned for that little one's kiss,
And I've said, as the tears down my cheeks 'gan to roll, "Could a merciful God have done this?"
But ah, when the first throb of anguish was past, when the wounds were less jagged and sore,
I thought of that babe in the bright world above, an angel of God's evermore.

"For of such is the kingdom of heaven," Christ said, then the wife to my side I would call,

And I'd point to the skies, and we'd both dry our eyes, for 'twas God who knew best after all.

I have seen this man rise, and that one ascend, to affluence, fortune and fame,
And I've envied the friends I knew in my youth, who have made for themselves quite a name;
And I thought God was harsh that he willed I should toil, while others around lived at ease—
The full cup of fortune was theirs first to drink, while I'd naught to drain but the lees.

But now I can see in the evening of life, as I follow
God's methods divine,
That not one of the lives I envied so much, has been blessed so completely as mine;
And I would not change places with one of the friends, of those envious days I recall,
Which makes it quite plain, all over again, that it's God who knows best after all.

As now I look back o'er the years of my life, and pass ev'ry one in review,

And weigh up its pleasures, its cares and its strife, as a man bowed with years oft will do;
I can see how I wronged the Almighty above, when I questioned his mandates divine,
And I'm glad I was led through the years by his love, regardless of wishes of mine,
For I could not foresee where ambition would lead, as I yearned above others to climb;
But ambition is oft but a cloak for mere greed, and God could foresee all the time.
And not one single thing the Almighty has done, would I alter, no matter how small;
From beginning to end, I've had God as a friend, and
'twas he who knew best after all.

It has ever been thus and 'twill ever be thus, in the Almighty's wonderful plan,
The Father all wise, in his home in the skies, knows what's best for the children of man;
When the grief's hard to bear, our heart-strings may tear, and dazed we may be by the blow,
But 'twill all be made plain, let that ease your pain, and the reason we some day shall know.

When our patience God tries, ah, don't criticize, but with meekness bow down to his will,
For whate'er may betide,
Christ still doth abide,
and God, he our Father is still;

Just do what is right, keep your faith ever bright, for not even a sparrow
doth fall,
But in Heaven 'tis known,
so let's joyfully own,
that God knoweth best after all.

"As I look back o'er the years of my life!"

Drugged Watchmen*

International Sunday School Lesson for May 8, by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Craig

EL NATHAN BAR JONAH, is the friend of the bridegroom, Benoni Zippor. He leaves his home that he may reach the home of his friend in season for the final preparations for the wedding; about the beginning of the first watch. He helps to adjust the wedding garment of the bridegroom, which is of the finest broadcloth, embroidered with gold. He drapes with care the handkerchief of scarlet silk, fringed with gold, and richly embroidered with cherub-heads. His friendly offices extend also to the preparation of the mock bridegroom, a small boy, attired exactly like the bridegroom, whose part is to walk in the wedding procession beside the bridegroom, imitating his every movement. His office is thus to draw attention from the bridegroom, and relieve his embarrassment.

As the hour of midnight approaches, the musicians are called out, four in number. They have their instruments ready: the vod, or guitar, the kanon, or harp, the kemenjeh, or violin, the tamboura, or lute. They are placed in the lead, behind them the bridegroom and his mimic; following after is the friend of the bridegroom; then comes the mock bride, a little girl seated on a horse, and dressed exactly as the bride will be, horn, veil and all. Then comes a company of friends. The procession is lighted by flaming torches held aloft.

And what is occurring in the home of El Nathan, during these hours? He has told his servants to watch for his return, but he has not named the hour when they may expect him. During the first watch, the faithful servants stand with loins girt and lamps in hand, ready to open the door for the returning master.

It is close on to midnight, and the procession halts at the home of the bride. The virgins light their lamps, and there is music and shoutings of joy, as the bridegroom and his friends enter the home, and then there is a seeming struggle to get possession of the bride, who is finally placed upon a richly decked horse, and made a part of the procession. She rides alone, but by her side walk two relatives, one her own, and the other the bridegroom's. These grasp the reins of her horse. At midnight they enter the church. The wedding ceremony consists in standing face to face, heads inclined so that foreheads touch. A veil is thrown over both by the officiating priest, who pronounces a blessing, reads passages of scripture about marriage, and closes with prayer. The wedding procession is reformed and proceeds to the home of the bridegroom.

In the home of El Nathan, the servants grow weary waiting for the return of their master. They drink wine to pass away the time and become drunken, and so quarrel and beat each other.

It is the "third watch," and the marriage supper is spread in the home of Benoni. The guests have been received with a kiss, and their feet and hands have been washed by servants, and their bodies have been perfumed. And all are clothed in rich wedding garments through the generosity of their host. Time passes quickly in exchange of friendly words and courtesies, but before the third watch is ended, all have returned to their homes.

El Nathan stands at the door of his home, and knocks and knocks, but no servant appears to open it. He must force his way in. Alas, he finds his servants all in drunken sleep. He notes the confusion everywhere; drinking cups, empty and overturned; wine vessels broken, bruised faces upturned, made more hideous by sleep. And the master commanded that they shall all be beaten with stripes, the greatest number to those who had been longest in his service and so knew their duty best. Did he forever banish the wine cup?

ANDREW CARNEGIE.—You are more likely to fail in your career from acquiring the habit of drinking liquor than from any or all the other temptations likely to assail you. You may yield to almost any other temptation, and reform—may brace up, and if not recover lost ground, at least remain in the race and secure and maintain a respectable position. But from the insane thirst for liquor escape is almost impossible.

Illustration and Application

As this is the quarterly temperance lesson, the temperance aspect of the parable, the drunken watchman (vv. 45, 46), should receive chief attention, suggesting the great wrong of clouding one's faculties with drink when in any position of responsibility. What could be a greater crime than to drug a watchman? Here is an army asleep only a few miles from the camp of its foes. And here is a picket whose alert watchfulness, as he stands between them and their foes, is their only safety. But there is a bottle in his pocket, and part of its contents are in his brain, and he is leaning asleep against a tree, while the enemy stealthily move by him to slaughter his sleeping companions, to whom he should have given timely warning. And here is another drugged watchman in the bow of a ship, as insensate as the post he is holding up in drunken stupor, while his vessel, for lack of the warning he should have given, is dashing into the breakers which will become his winding-sheet, and also of his shipmates. The broken bottle beside him tells the story. And here is a railroad watchman lying with his bottle beside the switch, which he should have shifted to save that oncoming train. Even a "watchman of Zion" has sometimes been drugged, as when Hophni and Phinehas, the priests of God, erred through strong drink. And why should not the public officer, appointed to watch the people's interest, as policeman or mayor or judge, keep his brain clear? So the business man, who is set to watch the interests of a great corporation, needs an unclouded brain. Not less the father, set to guard the interests of a family, and surely not less the mother, also. The man who seems to have no responsibility, except for himself, needs to keep clear those faculties that were made to serve as watchmen against the perils that threaten him. The nerves are the watchmen of the body. By what we call pain they give the alarm against dangers from cold and heat and other perils. A man goes out in the snow. If the watchmen nerves are not drugged and dulled with liquor, they will tell him when to go to the fire or to put on more clothes, but if the watchman is drugged, he may lie down in the snow and freeze to death. So in hot weather it is drinking men chiefly who are sunstruck, because the watchmen nerves are too stupefied to tell them to keep out of the hottest blaze of the sun. The men who are killed and hurt by accidents are, many of them, also the victims of drugged watchmen.

Three recent wars have illustrated the importance of abstemious habits in the battle of life. The Japanese, who are winning the world's admiration, use intoxicants but little, and they have the severest laws of any nation against tobacco and opium. No one is allowed to use tobacco until ruin for both worlds. He might well cry out to God and man, "Can you undo that for me?"

A rich man had been wont to say to his temperate friends, "Let liquor alone, and it won't hurt you. It's no affair of mine. If they wish to drink, that is their business." One day he heard that his wife and child had been killed in a railroad wreck, because the engineer was drunk. He never said again, "If you let liquor alone, it will let you alone." He knew at last what every man should see with almost as much as the guilty. "Personal liberty" to drink is "personal liberty" to endanger our fellows.

Cyrus, afterward king of Persia, when a prince, visited his uncle, Astyages, king of the Medes. One day Cyrus, as cup-bearer to his uncle, who praised him for his dexterity and grace, but reminded him that he had omitted one part of the ceremony, namely, tasting the wine before offering it to the king. "It was not through forgetfulness," said Cyrus, "but because I apprehended there was poison in the liquor, for I noted awhile ago how the lords of your court acted very strangely after they had tasted it. And you yourself tried to sing and dance, but could not stand upon your legs." "Have you never seen your father so?" "No, never." "It was this temperance boy, son of a royal abstainer, through whom the Jews were afterward brought back from captivity."

And it is by abstinence that we save ourselves and others to-day from worse captivity.

Here is a story of a child who saved her father from the captivity of drink. His wife urged him to remain at home evenings, and not to go to the saloon. He became angry, and went out of the house leading his little girl by the hand. The child, knowing how much her mother suffered, begged the father not to go to the saloon that night. He took her up into his arms, and on putting his face close to hers, his cheek was wet with a tear. He said, in telling his experience afterwards, "My anger completely melted away, I determined to go home and make my wife happy."

The French are teaching us by their bill-board campaign against "alcoholism," which refers to the condition of the chronic tippler, that it is not drunkenness that is most harmful, but the saturation of the body with drink. A man is less harmed by a monthly drunk after pay-day than by fashionable daily tipping that never reaches the staggering stage.

Young boys are yet more in danger of becoming captives of cigarette smoke, which, though small, are mighty despots. A magistrate in Harlem Court, New York, made the following significant declaration the other day: "Yesterday I had before me thirty-five boy prisoners. Thirty-three of them were confirmed cigarette smokers. To-day, from a reliable source, I have made the gruesome discovery that two of the large cigarette manufacturers in this country soak their product in a weak solution of opium."

One of the fairest homes in a large city was recently condemned and taken down by the authorities. Wealth and taste had done their best to make it beautiful. There seemed to be nothing lacking. But each successive owner sickened and died within its walls, until finally no tenant could be found willing to occupy it. Examination revealed an unsuspected secret beneath the foundations, the poisonous fumes from which had so contaminated the whole building as to render it totally unfit to live in. In the same city and all over the land this story is paralleled in human lives. Young men and youth who have been favored by every circumstance of birth and fortune, a from whom the world has a right to expect corresponding achievements fall before their time with constitutions broken and faculties weakened. Cigarettes are directly responsible, in many cases, for this degeneracy, at least in its first stages. There is no chance for health or the development of a vigorous constitution if the child's system is so thoroughly impregnated with this poison.

In the name of athletics, as well as moralists, let us urge our boys to avoid whatever weakens their power. The man who aims to win a champion game avoids harmful indulgences. How much more should we do so to win the game of life.

An "Athletic Restaurant" is one of the new things. Surely no one would expect to find intoxicants or narcotics there, but strong, healthful food and drink. Health is worth more than all the false and short-lived indulgences that threaten it. David seems to have had the liquor dealer in mind when he wrote: "In the secret places doth he murder the innocent, his eyes are privily set against the poor."

A WEDDING FEAST IN PALESTINE

twenty years of age, and no student can use it even if years older than that. And Japan excels us also in successful prohibition of opium, except for medical prescriptions. We must not allow our Christian country to fall below Japan in that. The American people have vetoed the proposed opium monopoly for the Philippines, but we have yet to decide what we will put in its place. Not alone with reference to tobacco and opium, but also with reference to liquors, the regimen of a Japanese regiment is that of the athlete. Cervera's defeated crews had been soaked with liquors before the fight, but Dewey won the Manila fight with nothing stronger than coffee for his men. We do not wish to glorify war, but these facts all suggest that in the victories of peace also, and in the battle of life, the honors go to the abstainers. Not less than soldiers or policemen and other peace guards need to abstain. In Pittsburg, Mr. Harry Moore, Police Superintendent, has recently taken a strong stand against drunken police-officers. And well he may, for a drunken policeman himself makes disorder instead of checking it.

But who is there that can safely lose self-control through drink? Surely not the railroad watchmen that handle the signals, or the engineers that look out of their cabs, watching the track. "Can I do anything for you?" said one man to another, who looked troubled. "Can you undo something for me?" was the reply. "I neglected to give the warning signal, and a whole trainload of people dashed through the bridge I guard, to swift destruction. Can you undo that for me?" Many a man who has invited another to drink, by example, if not by words, has caused his

CITY SHOALS FOR COUNTRY LADS

By OWEN KILDARE

"The first man addressed was a policeman"

THE utterances of men who have hewn a prominent place for themselves by their own energy and efforts, are always worthy of consideration. At the advice of Horace Greeley, "Go West, young man, go West," is not more frequently accepted by the youths of the East, is probably accounted for by the fact that Greeley himself, although country-born, preferred to remain in the great metropolis of the East. And so, instead of going westward, the lads from the small towns and the country flock forever to the greater city.

How do the three localities compare? An observing man framed this answer: "God made the country, man made the town."

Experience inclines me to believe that this is true, as the man-made city receives its best and worst additions from the outlying territories.

This is the day of individuality. In all fields of endeavor we find men, who, by their strong personalities, exert controlling influences in their chosen spheres. Of these men we hear constantly. Daily papers, weekly and monthly publications, rush to print their pictures and stories at the slightest provocation. An overwhelming proportion of these men are from the country, and their examples stimulate some lads outside of the city to come into it and do likewise.

Papers and publications have various readers and they print various reading matter—the good with the bad—to please all. Among the bad reading matter, comes the accounts of exploits, daring or desperate, of notorious criminals, and in the accompanying biographical sketches it is often stated that these men were from the country. Their examples stimulate another class of boys outside of the city, and they, too, come into it to do likewise.

It is only fair to say that the latter class of youths is almost entirely confined to the small towns.

It is not my intention to throw unnecessary odium on a number of men who are among the most important factors of our industrial and commercial life, but it cannot be denied that a certain element among the traveling salesmen is only too willing to act as press-agents of the wickedness of the city. Any hotel, in any small town, frequented by drummers, will furnish the needed proof for my assertion.

The drummer, by the very nature of his calling, is a shiable creature. Every male inhabitant of the small town visited by him, can be of possible use to him and, to make himself agreeable, he takes the popular way of telling risky stories about recent wicked happenings in the city. The older inhabitant has his memory refreshed by these tales—he has been to the city; the youth has his curiosity awakened—and determines to see these things in the city.

But while the fate of these boys after their arrival in the city is sad, and often ends badly, it will be more profitable to look at the situation as it awaits the average country lad, who comes with honorable intentions.

At the outset, I want to say that I believe the free advertising given to many self-made men who came from the country, is answerable for much discouragement among the invading lads. There was a time when lads came here to leave fewer mouths to feed at home, to help lighten the heavy mortgage; or to find education and a living, even a fair competence, and they were reasonable in their aims. Now, with so many from the field and farm among the money kings and magnates, the lads come with but the one desire, to emulate these high priests of the golden calf.

It will hardly be disputed that the country lads come to the metropolis, or any large city, are not overburdened with money. They are accustomed to frugality at home, and, by habit and on account of limited resources, determine to be exceedingly frugal when in the city, at least until the time when "their pile is made."

It is this apparently laudable desire to be economical which only too often leads the youth into environments that do not fail to affect his future welfare and frequently mar the chances of his success. I feel assured that by stating this I will not be considered an advocate of wasteful extravagance.

There is nothing so vain and misleading as generalities, when a case in point can clearly illustrate the meaning one wishes to convey. It is a sorrowful fact that during my experience I have become acquainted with a number of such cases. The recital of one or two of these cases may help us to draw a few deductions.

Three years ago, Edward H. came to New York City from "up the State." Possessed of twelve dollars and a perfectly developed appetite, Edward came to get a few of the millions which are supposed to be waiting for ambitious young lads. He did not know a single person in the city, and the first man addressed by him was a policeman. The officer was the typical and facetious uniformed bully, and had rare sport with the young "hayseed."

Edward, bewildered by the noise and tumult of the city, was not in a condition to detect the policeman's intent, and took most of his alleged humor at its face value. Asked if he had any money, he truthfully answered "Yes," without mentioning the exact amount, and thereupon the guardian of peace and order, advised him to jump on a car for the Bowery, "where they'll trim you all right, all right."

Broadway and Bowery were the only two New York names familiar to the lad, and he landed on the latter, the old highway of the foolish and the miserable, to make his twelve dollars last as long as possible.

Everything looked promising. The "hotel" offered every convenience for fifteen cents a night. Almost next door was a restaurant that served every possible dish for ten cents, with coffee or tea included. All around were "nickel" barber shops; cut-rate Chinese laundries, washing shirts for five cents, and other articles proportionately cheap; second-hand clothing stores, where men could buy whole suits of clothes from two dollars up. Edward quickly reckoned that he could easily hold out for over a month, in which time he would surely get employment. The theory of it was correct, but the practice was a different thing.

"Shown to a table by the landlady"

What Edward did not know, and what is often overlooked by others, is that the Bowery is peopled by thousands of men who come there through some mental default, which climaxes in a "swearing-off" from all honest, steady work. These men, once stranded on the Bowery, only leave there by a miracle, and miracles do not happen every day. Their whole striving consists in devising some means, other than work, to prolong their existence, and they become recognized personages in this weird and filthy nether-world Bohemia. If they do not actually lead youths astray, they are powerful forces for evil by their ever-present example.

Edward H. landed on the Bowery over three years ago—and is still there. Why? Simply because his frugality found too many chances. It is nice to be philanthropic when the expense is insignificant. Edward had learned at home that to do good was a fundamental element of our religion. Without knowing it, he had been studied by several "has-beens," and he learned through them that ten cents, instead of paying for a meal for one, could buy a meal for two, "almost as good," if you only knew where to get it. The boy was prevailed upon to try the scheme—including the guide and friend, as a matter of course—and, ere long, thought it advisable to patronize the "nickel meal" places entirely, whether alone or in company of a hungry "has-been."

And during all this time Edward was becoming inoculated with the virus of perdition. Not that he inclined to develop into a patron of the few remaining places on the Bowery that offer glaring and repulsive exhibitions of vulgarity, but he learned how easy it was to "live" without hard work in the big city, provided one did not care very much what became of one's manhood.

Men and women, most conscientious in their callings as missionaries and writers, have fought and exposed the Bowery lodging-houses until the unsavory pest-holes were compelled to run under fair sanitary conditions, and competition among the lodging-house keepers has also improved affairs; but the one thing which is still the same as before, is the moral atmosphere. Spend an evening's hour in the reading or lounging-room of a lodging-house, and you will learn more of the dangers in the pathway of an innocent boy than I could tell you in this paper. A criminal, realizing what his life is, may have the conscience to warn a young man against becoming a thief; but the able-bodied scoundrel, who takes to begging as a livelihood, from no other reason than sheerest laziness, is left without a shred of compunction. And every lodging-house has its full quota of petty thieves, professional beggars, and men who work just enough to pay for their night's lodging and a beefstew, trusting for all else to some fortunate chance. What an influence this sort of a combination must have on a youth like Edward H. is not difficult to imagine.

Quite rightly you might object here and tell me that not all country lads go to the Bowery. It happens that I know of a case, where a young man from the country never saw the Bowery, and still—but here is his story:

Walter F. came to the city less than two years ago. His family enjoyed a certain prominence in their section, and Walter had received a fair education at a nearby academy. Education brought progressive ideas, and the young man found his home locality too narrow. He felt himself called to the city, and, refusing letters of introduction offered to him by neighbors to their friends in the metropolis, he came, ready to see and to conquer.

Provided with a fair amount of money, and not in the least resembling the proverbial "hayseed," Walter easily found a hotel on Broadway, where he intended staying until able to secure suitable quarters. This he succeeded in doing on the very next day, by aid of the advertisements in the daily papers. He established himself in a boarding-house in the "thirties."

The terms—ten dollars a week—were somewhat higher than he had expected to pay, but the house was nice and comfortable, and the landlady, a woman of evident refinement. The first meal in the new home convinced Walter of the justification of his choice.

Shown to a table by the landlady, he found two young women and a young man, who were to be his permanent table companions. During the meal he learned that the young women were self-supporting, one being employed as saleslady, the other as stenographer; while the young man was a city salesman. In return, he informed his new friends that he had come to the city to "make his fortune," which information elicited offers from the others to help him in his task. It was but natural that Walter should show appreciation of their kindness and he tried his utmost to make himself agreeable. His friends saw to it that he had ample opportunities. But let us be fair to them.

They were calloused by the metropolitan spirit of independence. Every one of them, depending on their own efforts for their living, was permeated with selfishness, and had learned by prevalent business methods to be always on the look-out for a "good thing." Walter gave no indication of his financial resources, and, assuming the air of a man of the world, his new friends were perhaps excusable in deeming him sufficiently experienced to take care of himself. Within a very short time Walter was quite familiar with the many cafes abounding thereabout. His friends did the guiding; Walter did the paying, which he did not mind, conceiving a great liking for the artificiality of it all. They never reached a state of intoxication or boisterousness. But four are quite a crowd, and the prices of drink and food on Broadway are the other extreme from those on the Bowery.

Pretty soon, Walter thought it was high time that he should find something to do.

Until then his search for employment had been most desultory. But he had already learned that his education and "worldly wisdom" were not of much avail. What he lacked was experience; that experience which can only be learned by beginning at the very bottom, and, of course, to do that was out of the question when one lives at a fashionable boarding-house and is fairly well known "about town."

His situation becoming desperate, Walter asked his friend, the city salesman, for advice. This fellow was not half as bad as he might have been, and through his influence Walter obtained a position with the firm at a salary of six dollars a week. This was not even enough to pay his board, leaving other expenses out of the question. Still, some few dollars of his patrimony remaining, Walter decided to stay at his expensive boarding-house until "things would take a turn for the better."

Walter has not lost his employment, although he has been very little promoted, and has not been obliged to change his boarding-house, and I wish I could tell you that his spare time had been utilized for profitable purposes. However, instead of it, Walter has outgrown all the earmarks of rusticity; travels with a rather "fast set"; frequently telephones to a notorious poolroom during working hours; has the sallow, unhealthy complexion and bloodshot eyes which come from late hours, and has but rarely the time to "dash off" a line or so to the old folks at home.

In spite of all this there are still people who believed in Walter, and prophecy for him a career in the business world; but I will never be jealous of him, for I would not care to have his conscience. I know lads from the country who were not sufficiently energetic or bright to meet with success, yet who, withal, were honest and sincere in their struggle and effort, and who do not write home because their hearts are fairly breaking from shame at their failure, and, while I do not approve of it, I can understand it. But show me the youth from the farm who cannot "find the time" to write that letter home, which is awaited with greatest anxiety, read with eager eyes, and sometimes wept over, and you will, with me, see in him the making of a bad man.

Perhaps what I have written so far will lead you to believe that I am of the opinion that the average country lad is incapable of keeping from the downward path, when he reaches the city. Nothing is further from my mind.

I will yield to no man in admitting that much of our municipal success in various lines has been accomplished by men who came from the field and forest, and that among country lads are thousands and thousands who equal—sometimes surpass—our city boys in sturdiness, integrity and intelligence; but I cannot forget that they, as we, are human beings, having the same frailties in common, and are just as apt to stumble as the urchin who has never known a better home than a dirty tenement in the slums.

It has never been denied that environment is a great factor in character-making. It is also admitted that the environment of the country is beneficial and reformatory, else the many shipments of boys, picked up in the streets or taken from penal institutions, and sent by different societies to various parts of the country, there to be apprenticed to farmers, would not be made. If such is the case, is it reasonable to suppose that the lad who comes from the bosom of a Christian family in the country, will not be affected by the environment of the city and its many pitfalls?

To my mind there is only one answer.

I do not care how solidly founded in Christian teaching the country boys may be; deprive them of the props of home influence, without giving them anything in place of it, and many will fall—perhaps not in a financial sense, but in a weightier—a moral sense.

Then—this being the expression of an individual opinion—I would say: "Do not let your boy, whether son, brother or cousin, come to the city with no better passport than the advice to shift for himself."

We have good people here, as you have them in the country, and there are many homes which have room for a country lad. And we have ministers who know of these homes, and who, by directing a youth to them, will bring mutual benefit to both parties. There is not a superintendent of a mission in the city who will not gladly send you all needed information before your boy leaves his home. And, besides, there are many other good people in the city, who have still time to be of service to their fellows. Your boy comes not as a beggar; he comes as one who has a gift to bring to the city, his brain and brawn, and he will be received as he should be, if he wants to deliver his gift intact.

Far be it from me to advise you to send the lad to be confined here in a cloister-like cell, from which he would be permitted to step at certain times, under the closest surveillance. Gregariousness is a confirmed trait of human nature, and cannot be suppressed. The devil has a chattel mortgage on the solitude of some minds. Just because many of us in the city realize that all here is not as it should be, we are striving the harder to make it so; and there is room in the ranks for many more, who can strive, and battle, and pray.

Sweetmeats in India

It is wonderful how the sweetmeat enters into the life of the Hindu, says a writer in the London Daily Express. It is eaten out of all proportion to his other food; but then an Indian sweetmeat is a sweetmeat. Many a Hindu family lives entirely on confections. The Mayara and Halwi castes make the confections, and the delicacies are highly prized by all classes of people in India—so much so that the demand for them by the poorer families is limited only by their means. The dainties manufactured and sold by the Halwis require very considerable skill, and are very costly. Some of the confections are called pakki methai, and usually consist of flour, pease-meal, pulverized rice, cream, etc., fried in "ghi," or baked in strong solutions of sugar. So it will thus be seen that the Hindu, in offering sweets to his implements and his gods, does the best within his power to pay homage to that which brings him the where-withal to live.

After the offering, the various castes, congregate together, eat the sweets and hold high holiday. The writer castes, among whom are numbered the Government clerks, etc., pay homage to the items by which they get their living. At one ceremony some thirty clerks erected an altar on the roof of the building in which they work. The altar was made of an old packing-case, draped with paper, and surmounted by a large bottle of ink. Around the bottle were placed pen-holders, nibs, sealing-wax, envelopes, blotting paper, and last, but not least, red tape. The clerks marched reverently to the ink-bottle, etc., offering them gifts of food and coins, the service concluding, as usual, with a feast of sweetmeats. Only certain castes may eat of the sweetmeats offered by other castes to the gods.

Peddlers and fakirs frequently take cakes of Ivory Soap, remove the name, cut them into small pieces, wrap these in tin foil and sell them at a high price as a new and wonderful cleanser. Those who have tried it say that nothing is better than Ivory Soap for taking out spots and for similar special uses. Ivory Soap is a powerful cleanser, but pure and safe.

IT FLOATS.

Prophet's Warning to Pleasure-Loving People Disregarded

OUR Authorized Version presents the passage associated with the topic, in so confused a manner that it is difficult to understand it and the Revisers have made no attempt to render its meaning clearer. The prophet is addressing the nobles and priests of Jerusalem. He reminds them that before the northern kingdom fell, he had warned its nobles and leaders of their impending doom. He recalls to their memory that he had compared the mount with its blooming vineyards, surrounding the summit on which Samaria was built, to a drunkard, whose brows were wreathed with a chaplet of vine leaves, and had told them that a foe would come who would devour their city, as man eats a ripe fig. His prediction has been fulfilled, as they knew, but there would come a time when the remnant of Samaria would turn to God, and he would bestow upon them their true crown, the source of beauty and strength.

Having reminded them of this prophecy and its fulfillment, he proceeds to warn them of their own danger, and tells them plainly that they are now no better than the leaders of Samaria had been. He has seen priests and nobles staggering from their feasts in Jerusalem, under the influence of wine, and when he has warned them, they had derided him. Destruction would fall upon them as it has fallen on Samaria, unless they changed their ways.

The figure is vivid and impressive, but it has no effect. The governing class, both in state and in religion, were given up to pleasure. They had ceased to trust in God for protection, and had made an alliance with the Egyptian king, who, they believed, would be able to protect them from their Assyrian foe. History tells how their hope failed and how terrible the prophet's warnings came true. They had to learn in the awful siege, in the thickening slaughter, and in the long exile of the survivors, that a nation which, from the highest classes to the lowest, abandons itself to dissipation and the pursuit of pleasure, regardless of the law of God, is inevitably doomed to fall sooner or later.

Due to the crown of pride. When the leaders of a nation have no other occupation than gratifying their passions and appetites, when they forget God and their duty to their country, and their obligation to the poor, and spend their money in dissipation, vain display, and frivolous amusements, they are degrading themselves, and undermining the power and prosperity of their land. Assyria, Greece, and Rome had to learn that lesson, and in comparatively recent times, France, through the same cause, underwent an experience that thrilled the world with horror. An acute observer who traveled through France in the middle of the Eighteenth Century, declared that the corruption of the aristocratic classes was preparing the way for the worst convulsion in history. The men and women who should have been the crown and exaltation of the nation were selfish, oppressive and relentless in their treatment of the masses. Paying no taxes themselves, they wrung from the poor the money which they squandered in dissipation. They mocked at religion, and gloried in their atheism. At last the people rose in their might, and with a disregard of God and righteousness, that they had learned from their oppressors, they slaughtered them without mercy. Never did a race of aristocrats suffer a more fearful punishment.

They also have erred through wine. It is remarkable that the most gifted, the most genial, and the most brilliant men, among the victims of the intoxicating cup. The very qualities of which men have most reason to be proud, expose them to the danger of falling through drink. Lawyers, statesmen, soldiers, and, to say the least, even clergymen, have yielded to this temptation. About thirty years ago, a minister, whose talents were of the highest order, was overworked. He was engrossed in the success of his church. His people almost idolized him. Meetings for young men, for Bible study, for scientific study, and, for other purposes, were held on successive nights. The minister was always present, and still he studied hard, and his sermons were marvels of thought and eloquence. At last, he grew dull and tired. Unhappily, he was not an abstainer. He discovered that his flagging spirits and his dull mind could be stimulated by liquor. It was but little that he took at first, but soon he was unable to prepare his sermons or preach without the stimulus. He discovered his danger too late. Then he threw off his restraint, drank deeply, and died a spiritual and moral wreck. None are safe but those who entirely abstain. No boy expects to become a drunkard, but he may be, if he begins to drink moderately and acquires the habit of drinking.

One Woman's Work of Faith

ON April 26 inst., occurs the twentieth anniversary of the opening of the Home for Children, founded by Mrs. Almira S. Steele, at Chattanooga, Tenn. The founder writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD: "We hope to celebrate it by having a bored well at our Summer Home. We have been needing it very much for several years. I had hoped that our two cisterns and three wells would supply our needs for my big family of 134 paupers. A kind Quaker friend made me a present of a ten acre lot, fifteen years ago, situated at Summit, on the Southern Railway, twelve miles from Chattanooga. I built on the land three cheap summer buildings, one for boys, one for girls, and the third for kitchen and laundry. The last was burned by tramps shortly after our leaving it one season. We have a schoolhouse there now. The new bored well will cost between $300 and $400, and if we can raise the money, we will have it this season.

"I have mothered, during these twenty years, 1,002 pauper children in all. During all that time, we have never had a child sick with typhoid fever, scarlet fever, scarlatina, pneumonia, diphtheria, or grippe. No one has ever been seriously scalded, or burned, or injured by a fall. No serious accident has occurred. I want to give God all the glory for having protected us. When I recall that verse in the Bible, 'He shall give his angels charge over thee,' I have said to the children, 'I think the Lord must have a whole regiment of angels guarding us; we have been so wonderfully cared for.' While many have disappointed me in some way, and I had hoped for better results, I blame myself for not having been more faithful as a mother, and I comfort myself with the thought that many mothers have been disappointed in their own children, while having desired to do their very best. However, I leave the results to the Lord, and trust that if he spares my life a little longer, I will do my duty more faithfully with his help.

"I have never received a cent of wages, nor salary, during these twenty years, but I do receive the sum of $125 monthly from our county funds. I am very grateful for this. It is the only regular income I have from any source for the work; yet, that sum does not pay for the board and wages of my helpers, to say nothing of leaving a cent for the feeding and running expenses of our big family. The Lord has wonderfully supplied our needs, and I have never yet been obliged to run in debt, nor to beg assistance from any one in any way, except to solicit transportation from the railroads."

Mrs. Steele's Home for Children is a wonderful illustration of God's way of helping those who are devoted to his work. She gave all her personal fortune to the Home in the early years of its existence. Many friends, unsolicited, have sent her gifts (including not a few readers of this paper), and these, together with the meagre income already mentioned, have sufficed till now. She will be glad to reply to any inquiries that may be sent to her concerning the Home.

Our Population 80,000,000

ACCORDING to a bulletin just issued by the Census Bureau, the estimated population of the United States at the close of 1903, exclusive of Alaska and insular possessions, was 79,900,389—an increase of 3,905,814 since 1900. According to these estimates, New York is now a city of 3,716,139 inhabitants; Chicago 1,873,880; Philadelphia 1,367,716; St. Louis has just passed, and Boston has almost reached, the 600,000 mark; Baltimore has 531,313; Cleveland is ahead of Cincinnati, which cities have 414,950 and 332,934, respectively. Buffalo is credited with 381,403; San Francisco with 355,919, and Pittsburgh with 345,043. Detroit, Milwaukee and New Orleans have just passed 300,000, and Washington is close to that figure.

A Bargain in Music

67 Slightly Damaged Sets for Christian Herald Readers

We have on hand the final remnant—sixty-seven sets—of the last edition of the "World's Best Music." We prefer to close out these sets at a low price rather than hold them over until the fall months. We have reserved the remaining sets for readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and they will be sold, as long as they last, at about the cost of making and handling. Some of these sets are a little soiled from handling in our stockroom, but there are no torn pages or parts missing. For all practical purposes they are as good as new. The coupon printed below will bring you a set for examination, and if it is not satisfactory you may return it to us. You do not buy until you see the books. Every lover of music will appreciate this opportunity of obtaining the world's greatest collection of music at a bargain.

Size of Volumes, 9 x 12 Inches

Library of the World's Best Music

The work contains 300 instrumental selections by the greatest composers; melodious, not too difficult, including popular and operatic melodies, dances, funeral marches, and classic and romantic piano music. There are 350 best old and new songs, duets, trios, and quartets. The volumes are richly illustrated with 400 portraits and illustrations, many of them being handsome chromatic art plates printed in many colors. The work contains 500 biographies of musicians, and more than 100 copyrighted selections by American composers. It is the most complete collection of music in existence.

2,200 Pages of Sheet Music

The volumes are crowded with the best selections for every occasion. There are 2,200 pages of sheet music, which would cost, if purchased one piece at a time more than $200.00. The volumes are nearly sheet music size, and are especially bound so as to open flat at the piano and remain open. All the music is bright, attractive and melodious, and not too difficult for the average pianist or singer. In the preparation of the work 20 editors and special contributors have assisted. It has been endorsed by music-loving people in every English-speaking country. 400 composers are represented, including such world-famous names as Paderewski, Balfe, Liszt, Wagner, Mozart, Gounod, Beethoven, De Koven, Strauss, Sullivan and Handel. There are eight volumes in the set, handsomely bound in half-leather or cloth. Size of volumes, 9 x 12 inches—nearly sheet music size.

Every Home in Which There is a Piano should possess this splendid Musical Library. As long as the slightly marred sets last they will be sold to CHRISTIAN HERALD readers at $19.00 for sets in half leather binding, and $16.00 for the cloth binding, and you may pay in small payments of $1.00 a month. The amount saved by securing one of the remaining sets is shown by the fact that the regular price of sets is $48 and $36. As very few sets are left we advise you to order promptly to avoid possible disappointment. The coupon will bring you a set for examination. We feel confident that you will keep the set after you have examined it and compared it with other collections of music. If, owing to any cause, it is not entirely satisfactory, you may return it at our expense.

A MAD RIDE

By Virginia W. Frame

RUMORS of the men's discontent had come to the young superintendent as the rumblings of distant thunder, but he had not heeded their warning. That any one could doubt the security of the Melrose Oil Company, had seemed to him ridiculous; that the men should fear their pay would not be forthcoming on account of the addition of two hundred men to the force, had argued an ignorance of the world, of which he had not believed even the people of this little out-of-the-way town of West Virginia capable. Barton was a city man, his position of superintendent in Four Corners being of but a few months' duration. With his ear tuned to the beating of city-bred hearts, he had not yet learned to take the pulse of the mountaineer.

That afternoon he had felt for the first time that the anxiety of the foreman, Matterson, might not be all an old man's imaginings.

"You are certain, Nick, that the money will be here by pay hour in the morning?" Matterson had asked, about two o'clock, a note of trouble in his voice.

"As certain as I stand here, Matterson," the younger man responded. "The company has never failed us."

"It isn't every time like this," the old man went on apologetically, "but the strikes in Wetzel county have affected them, and this pesky weather has got on their nerves. They've taken the notion that they won't be paid, and you can't get them out of it. They won't listen to reason, and if it shouldn't come, God help us! I wouldn't have anything happen to you, boy, for my life. It would kill Melton, I think."

Barton grasped the outstretched hand. "Don't fret, sir, the letter said the money would arrive to-night, on the evening stage, and—and—keep it all from her, if you can."

When Matterson had left the room, Barton lost somewhat his air of composure. He nervously walked about the room, going often to the window, whence a view of the stage road was to be had over the tree tops. He noticed men grouped together, talking in low voices, or standing sullenly silent in the doorways. A steady rain had begun to fall on the hills, already dripping with the rain of many days. A tap on the door, gentle though it was, showed Barton how his nerves, too, had begun to be affected by the spirits of those about him. He steadied his voice to call out, "Come in," and came forward with a quick exclamation of welcome, as a young girl, slight and fair, entered the room.

"Melton!" he cried. "What has brought you out in such weather, dearest?" "Forgive me, Nick; but I overheard father telling mother how uneasy he was about you and the men, and I could stand it no longer." The young girl came to him, her troubled eyes searching his. "Won't you tell me what it all means?"

"Dear one," he said, taking her slim hands in both of his, "this weather has affected you, as it has the rest of us. There is no danger in the world. What your father fears is that our money for the men's wages will not arrive by pay-hour in the morning. But there is no reason in the world to think it will not come. It always has, so why should it fail at this critical time? And even if it should be delayed by some accident, the men will listen to reason."

Melton slowly shook her fair head. "I believe not, Nick. They have been so suspicious lately—and see what I found on our porch as I came out. I brought it to you first, so as not to worry father."

She handed him a piece of crumpled paper, on which was written in a firm, even handwriting: "Mr. Matterson,—Sir, if the money is not on hand in the morning, and you stand by the boss, your house will be in danger of fire, as well as the works."

Barton bit his lips to keep back his anger. "The cowards!" he muttered. "Wilsey wrote that, but we'll show him."

Then catching the sound of a half-stifed sob from his companion, he forced himself to a semblance of cheerfulness that he did not feel. "Why, Melton, child," he cried gaily, "don't cry. In the morning we'll all be laughing at our fears—or this evening. I will send you word when the stage comes in."

"But if it shouldn't come?" she urged. "And I fear it won't, for a frightful storm is coming up." Even as she spoke a clap of thunder broke over the house and rolled away down the hills.

The man strode to the window and surveyed the darkening landscape with unfriendly eyes. Turning, he said, in a cold, firm voice, "Melton, you must go home at once. It is going to storm soon, I fear, and you must be safely housed. The stage must have started before the storm began, and may be in at any moment. Trust me, can't you, dearie, and promise me to banish your fears? For all will be well in the morning."

"I do trust you, Nick," she said, as she wrapped her light gossamer about her, "but I can't promise not to worry when you are in danger."

He escorted her into her house, then slowly returned to the works. The hills were continually lashed by the white fury of the lightning. One peal of thunder succeeded another; the storm increased in violence. At seven o'clock, Barton knew that the stage would not come. He heard the voices of the men in the work-room below, though it was past the hour for dispersing. In answer to his ring, a man with tousled hair and unsteady eyes made his appearance. "Wilsey," Barton said, eyeing the man coldly, with the thought of the threatening note in his mind, "Why have not the men gone home?"

"They decline to go, Mr. Barton," the other answered, indifferently. "They say they're going to stay until morning, sir."

Barton turned back to his desk, and the man, taking the act as a dismissal, smiled, shrugged his shoulders, and left the room. Barton heard his voice as he entered the room below, and heard it followed by a muttering of angry voices.

"It's a good sixty miles," he slowly said. "I wonder if I could do it?" Once more he went to the window, his eyes turning to the road, indistinct in the mists of the falling rain. "I'll do it," he suddenly exclaimed, his voice resounding in the long room. "I'll do it, or die." But he did not expect to die, new-born courage never does.

Down in the stables, he felt his way to his horse's stall. "Peralta," he said, caressing the smooth neck, "are you with me, old fellow? It's win or die, my good friend." The horse whinnied joyously and rubbed his nose against his master's coat. He impatiently pawed as he was being bridled, as though he, too, understood the importance of the night's work and was anxious to be off. Only once did he hesitate. It was when, on reaching the door, the pouring rain dashed in his face, the thunder pealed above his head, and the lightning flared in blinding flashes before his eyes. A second later, and he had plunged forwards on a ride for long afterwards the talk of the community, and for Barton, certainly one that would not be forgotten to his dying day.

Night had settled on the hills like a mighty death-cap, leaving the world in darkness; only by the lurid glare of the piercing lightning could the narrow, slippery road be discerned, winding tortuously down the hills, with rocky ascents to one side and sheer precipices to the other. Barton made no attempt to guide his horse; dropping the bridle, he leaned forward, stroking the animal and whispering encouraging words in his ear. To the reverberations of thunder were added the mighty sound of waters rushing down the embankments, the howling of the winds, and the crash of the falling trees. Stones bounded and echoed as they flew from the path; in the distance, a deep boom told of a landslide. All the demons of a world gone mad seemed loosed on their path, whipping the elements into a fury. A savage tempest, rumbled menacing comes to a defying world. A forest in unrelenting throes of turmoil groaned and shrieked imprecations into the upper air. From Stygian darkness the scene would be ablaze with a luridness of unearthly day. Balls of fire played with diabolic brilliancy among the treetops or flared elfishly down the road. Then a tetry of night would follow, blacker than ever by contrast, and hideous with the thousand noises of the storm. Through the Peralta ran as fast as though all the Viches of Endor were at his back. He had become mad with the terror of it all, and his master no longer had to urge him, but only clung desperately as they fled; the horse stumbling now and then on a fallen tree, only to right himself instantly, panic-stricken at each new sound.

At twelve o'clock found them at Winchester, trembling, limp, unnerved, but to his dismay Barton found that his troubles were not over. The money, carefully wrapped and sealed, was delivered to him in good order, but there was not a horse in the village to make the return trip. The slow, heavy stage-horses were impossible, nor were the horses from the neighboring farms to be considered; so, in desperation Barton turned back to Peralta. Can you do it, you brave, old, faithful? he asked, stroking the intelligent bet's panting sides. His voice was trembling with weakness, but in his eye had come a new light of courage and recklessness. The men of the village shook their heads and sought to detain him, but he threw them off.

Once more the mad ride. Though the storm was abating somewhat in its fierceness, as the hours wore on the horse was becoming more and more exhausted. He stumbled more frequently, would reel unsteadily, and as he nervously tossed his head, Barton felt the warm blood from his nostrils blown back in his face. As he crossed the Delver Bridge, twenty miles from home, the trusty horse fell to the ground, groaned, and lay still. Barton threw off the light saddle and bridle, and by coaxing words and endearments urged him to a final trial. Half the distance was accomplished, when the poor animal once more gave out.

"I'll try to foot it?" Barton said as he dismounted. He gave his horse a final kindly stroke as he left him, saying, "Stay here, Peralta, boy, until I come for you."

Benumbed and stiffened in body, his precious package in hand, the man stumbled along the road. A faint light in the East told him of the approach of day. Attempting to hasten, he dizzily reeled, caught himself, and staggered on a few paces, only to fall wearily on the other side of the road. "I will go on," he muttered, "I will—I will," his voice fell into a faint cry as he sank back against the bank.

A faint sound coming from the distance caught his attention. He strained his sense to make out what it was. The blood beat wildly in his heart as the realization came to him that it was a light wagon or carriage that he heard. Then the fear that it would not come his way, going the lower road instead, became so frightful to him that he painfully dragged himself to the ridge of the hill. The sound continued to approach, until there appeared a light wagon driven by a fair-haired girl.

"Melton, Melton!" He cried. "She has come for me—has saved me, saved me!" he repeated, hysterically.

Just at that moment the girl's searching eyes made out the figure on the ridge, and she rose in her seat and waved her hand.

"It's six o'clock?" she cried, as soon as she was in calling distance, "and the men have all gathered in angry mob; but we can make it! Hurrah!"

"You are a heroine, sweetheart," he whispered, as he mounted the seat.

"I've a prouder title than that," she said.

"My love!" He finished.

The Czarina's Midnight Ride

RUSSIA'S capital is all agog over the recent midnight drive of the young Empress around St. Petersburg. The Empress does not limit her peregrinations to the Noky Prospect and fashionable thoroughfares, but visits most of the out-of-the-way suburbs, where the appearance of the imperial carriage, with its bemedaled coachman and resplendent Cossack footman, creates commotion among the police.

The police are purposely not warned of the expeditions, in order to avoid any appearance of premeditation. The Empress is always accompanied by her eldest sister, the Grand Duchess Elizabeth. The idea of the drives was suggested by the Grand Duchess, who is fond of going among the people and freeing herself at every opportunity from the trammels of etiquette. Grand Duchess Elizabeth is a favorite with the people on account of her democratic ways. She has succeeded in raising enormous sums for wealthy Moscow merchants by the charm of her manner. She invited the merchants to a bazaar, shook hands with them, gave them refreshments with her own hands. She also called upon their wives and drank tea with them.

The Emperor's attitude toward the people is shown by the orders given to the coachman who drives the royal children. He has been instructed that he must stop when he sees anybody desiring to present a petition. When the carriage is stopped, the little Grand Duchess Olga gravely rises, takes the petition smiles sweetly, and brings the document home to her father. While the heir apparent was driving the other day, a man rushed up, holding out a petition. A policeman seized him, but the heir to the throne ordered the coachman to halt, rebuked the policeman, and accepted the petition.

Napoleon's Jailer at St. Helena

For many years the name of Sir Hudson Lowe, the Governor of St. Helena during Napoleon's captivity, has rested under the imputation of cruelty to his distinguished prisoner. Quite recently these charges have been shown to be unfounded, and it has become apparent that Sir Hudson Lowe did all that lay in his power to make Napoleon's residence at St. Helena as comfortable as circumstances would allow. From the very first there was evidently a preconcerted plan, on the part of the ex-Emperor and his suite, to get up every sort of complaint in order to create a sensation in Europe, and prevent the interest felt in his favor from dying away. Sir Robert Spencer obtained access to the diary kept by Sir Hudson Lowe before refuting in detail the various groundless allegations of which the unfortunate custodian of Napoleon was, and to a great extent is still, the victim. If Sir Hudson Lowe caused a plaster bust of the King of Rome to be broken, it was because he knew very well that a forbidden letter was concealed in it, and the so-called act of "savage cruelty" had no more serious consequences than a burst of merriment from Mme. Bertrand, who exclaimed, "You have found us out!" For a time the slow progress made with the improvements at Longwood was Napoleon's favorite grievance. The workmen engaged on them was no sooner increased than the captive took to shooting with a pistol in such a manner that the balls flew about their ears, and their lives were in jeopardy. The building was forcibly suspended, and when Napoleon was requested to leave off his target-practice that it might be resumed, he flew into a rage and declared he was prevented from taking the amusements and exercise necessary for his health. The Emperor fancied a pony carriage imported by one of the English officers, and hoped that a similar one might be sent out from Europe for his use. Sir Hudson Lowe immediately induced the owner to surrender his purchase. Napoleon expressed his liking for a particular kind of fish; Sir Hudson forthwith sent to the market to lay an embargo upon all fish of that sort for the Longwood table. The task entrusted to Sir Hudson Lowe was well nigh an impossible one.

The Cremorne Mission's Work

The work of the McAuley Cremorne Mission, of New York, is already well known to the readers of this journal. Its efforts have been wonderfully blessed during the past year. Many have been brought to confess Christ, and many consoled in sickness and sorrow. The rigorous winter, with its bitter nights, has made the Mission's relief work very heavy, and it is greatly in need of help. Donations may be sent to the Superintendent, Mr. Charles E. Ballou, 104 West Thirty-second street, New York City.

Questions and Answers

SPECIAL NOTICE

All letters for the "Mail-Bag" must contain the name and address of the writer, not for publication, but so that an answer may be sent by mail if necessary.

A. W. T., New York. What is the meaning of "In my Father's house there are many mansions?"

A more literal interpretation is "abiding-places." The obvious meaning is that there is room enough for all, and a place for each. Some have taken it to mean that the stars were being prepared as the future habitations of God's people, but there is nothing in the language of Scripture to warrant such an interpretation.

Mark B. A., Rutherford, N. J. I read that at the recent New York East Conference, a prominent Methodist made the point that he believed the Church was justified in accepting gifts from any one who had a legal title to his money, and added that he (the speaker) would accept them, although he would not ask for them. Was he right?

Good law, possibly, but poor ethics. Legal right being assumed, the moral right is what the Church should consider. "Many things are lawful, but not expedient." Besides, the distinction of merit between one who stands, hat in hand, but mute, in the attitude of appeal, and one who voices his need, is a very subtle one. If there is a taint on the gift, surely silence on the part of the beneficiary won't remove it. In the old temple days, nothing that had spot or blemish, or which was the product of crime or immorality, was permitted to be offered to the Lord.

A St. Louis reader writes that the W. C. T. U. has denied the story of $300,000 capital being collected by a "Vice Syndicate." That organization, with many others, is working in behalf of the movement to cleanse the city. The correspondent suggests prayer as the best remedy for existing conditions.

T. R. I., Meadskinsht, B. C. What reason is there, apart from the claim of the Bible itself, for believing it to be inspired, and not the work of man?

Mr. D. L. Moody's answer to that question was the most impressive we have heard. He said, "I know the Bible is inspired because it inspires me." The effect of the Book is such as no other has had. It reveals truth that no one could have imagined. It finds a response in the human soul, which shows how profoundly true it is. Those who know it best and model their lives by its precepts become better men. Its influence on a community is invariably elevating. These are some of the reasons for believing it to be inspired; but it is not correct to say it is not the work of man. The theory of inspiration does not exclude, but rather implies human agency. Holy men of old spake as they were moved by the Holy Spirit (II. Peter 1: 21).

A. T., Chick Springs, S. C. In many places the Bible speaks of the "time of the end," to what period does it refer?

Usually, to the end of this dispensation, when it is expected that Christ will return and reign upon the earth for a thousand years. In other places, however, it refers to the close of that period, when the earth will be destroyed by fire. The context will guide you as to which is the time indicated in any particular passage.

G. B. L., Hartford, So. D. What has become of the Romans as a nation? They seemed to be a large and powerful nation in the time of Christ.

The ancient Roman Empire, at one time "mistress of the world," was overthrown in 476 A.D., and its people were widely scattered. The power of the empire had been slowly declining for two centuries, and many revolutions had stripped it of much of its possessions. The Italians of to-day are the remains of the once great empire. See Gibbon's History of Rome.

Reader. Your "Answered Prayers" column has been so great a blessing to many, that the thought occurred to me you might be willing to change it now into a "Praying Circle."

We think the suggestion to organize "praying circles" is one that could be carried out locally, by our readers, to great advantage. We should be glad to hear of any such circles that are organized.

John S., New York. Your article in reference to the admission of a retail liquor dealer to church membership was so admirably written that it was reprinted, and found general acceptance. There seems to be a general agreement that churches should not get their communion money from men who are engaged in the manufacture or sale of intoxicants. This seems to be important, and is perhaps the first opening made for the enemy, which then would almost make a claim for entrance by making a donation.

This whole matter of "the saloon-keeper's money" and the attitude of the Church concerning saloon-keepers' gifts, was thoroughly canvassed in this journal nearly two years ago, several hundred readers participating in the discussion. The general conclusion reached was that any gift accepted for the Lord's work should be free from taint or blemish, and that a man's legal right to money did not necessarily imply that he had a moral right to it.

New Albany Ind. Is it wrong to sell in the church, to make money to beautify the church? See John 2: 16, and parallel passages.

J. O. R., Newark, Ill. Under what conditions might it be a detriment to the world, should Japan win the war with Russia?

If the fears of an Asiatic union were realized, and if the "yellow swarm" of 300,000,000 Chinese, adopting Japan's progressive policy, were to become a warlike people, the peace of the world might be menaced, and its industries greatly affected. We believe, however, that the talk of the "yellow peril" is merely sensational. Japan's victory over Russia would mean the triumph of a heathen power over one at least nominally Christian. Though Russia is ignorant, bigoted, superstitious and intolerant, yet she is a Christian country, while Japan is Buddhist. The latter is, in a certain sense, quite as civilized as Russia. Many would regard Japan's success as a triumph of justice. If Russia wins, the mission field in Manchuria and Corea will be practically closed; if Japan wins, the field will be open, and more available for the workers.

Reader, Canisteo. In the sermon I heard on Easter evening, the preacher stated that the guards who were stationed over our Saviour's tomb were Caesar's bodyguards, and that they were Highland Scotchmen. Where did he get his authority for the latter statement?

We have no idea where he found such an extraordinary statement. Why not ask him?

L. L. L., Stanton, Minn., writes:

My attention has just been called to an article in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD entitled, "The President and Temperance." I honestly believe that, by God's help, a movement as set forth in this article would give the greatest possible impetus to the cause of temperance in our beloved land. Invite all the temperance people of this great land with a petition to the President. I feel sure that God would bless the effort.

P. V. F., Washington. Is not the sin of covetousness one of the greatest sins?

It is one of the cardinal sins denounced in the Decalogue, and its indulgence leads to the commission of many other sins.

E. A. P., Hatherly, Mass. Why is the "Mary called Magdalene" of Luke 8: 2 confounded with the woman "who was a sinner" of Luke 7: 36-40 and 45-50?

There is no positive evidence that the two were identical, yet some commentators hold that they were, and that Mary Magdalene (called by Talmudists "Mariam Megaddala," meaning either "Mariam of the braided locks" — "the twiner or plaiter of hair" — or of the town of Magdala, near Jerusalem, a place said to have been notorious for its lack of morals) and the woman of Luke 7: 37 were the same. Others identify her with Mary of Bethany, the sister of Lazarus, and still others believed she was the daughter of the Syro-Phœnician woman of Mark 7: 26. The question of her identity has given rise to great controversies from the earliest times, and it is still unsettled.

H. B., Archbold, O. Is a man justified in denying even the necessities of life to his wife and children (proper food and clothing), in order that he may keep his father or his wife's father from going to the poorhouse?

If he is willing to make personal sacrifice for the sake of an aged parent, we think he ought to be encouraged. If the person to be helped is given to drink, no sacrifice should be made, unless he reforms.

Nemo, Wilmington, Del. The marriage, if there was a ceremony performed by a clergyman or magistrate, is probably valid. The age of the parties is sufficient. As to the objection to the lady, unless the husband was grossly deceived, he has no remedy.

Mrs. C. M. V., Greenfield, Mo. I would like to see in print, the poem:

"Have you heard of the sun-bright clime,
Undetermined by snow, unhurt by time,
Where age has no power o'er our fadeless frame,
Where the eye is fire, and the heart is flame,
Have you heard of that sun-bright clime?"

Perhaps some reader can indicate where the rest of the poem may be found.

James D., St. Paul, Minn. 1. What is the average rate of pay for railroad workers on the strike? 2. What do you know reliably about the healthfulness or sickness of the place? Laborers (presumably unskilled) have been receiving $2.20 silver for ten hours' work, but are now on strike for 80 cents advance. The death rate is very high, 80 or 90 per cent; but a sanitary committee is now at endeavoring to remove many of the causes of disease and epidemics.

Subscriber, Sharon, Mass. 1. The case you give very much resembles that of the Prodigal son in several particulars. There is the wasteful lad, wasting his inheritance in riotous living; the father giving him his portion; the son and outwardly moral brother, who despises the other any consideration at his father's hands. Unfortunately, the climax is different. We do not know enough about the case to condemn the elder brother, though his influence the other is deprived of his patrimony, although it seems like a heartless selfish piece of business. 2. Drunkenness is frequently denounced because it is the universal vice, the cause of the greater part of the world's crime, misery, suffering, and sorrow. See I. Cor. 6: 10. 3. A man may be innocent in God's eyes and yet a constant criminal punishable by man's laws; again he may be held guiltless by man and yet be guilty before God. See Isa. 55: 8.

M. P. G. E., Scranton, Pa. Is physical pain of any advantage to man? Among the ancients, pain was believed to be necessary to prepare man for a better and purer state of existence. It is unquestionable that many natures are purged and refined by pain and suffering.

J. C., Waterford, Conn. 1. When a member of the Baptist or any other church is "dropped" or "excluded," is it proper that the cause be added in the records? 2. Kindly explain the difference in "dropping" and "excluding" a member.

1. It certainly should be entered, in order to make the record complete. 2. A member may be "dropped" for various reasons, such as non-attendance or removal, none of which may reflect upon his character and standing. "Exclusion," however, is a more serious matter. To shut one out of the community of God's people, there must be a substantial reason, which relates to conduct or character.

A number of readers have sent in additional answers to S. W. C.'s query concerning the verse, "Could I with the ocean fill?" The answer was given last week in THE MAIL-BAG.

R. A. Mode, Secretary of Union Sunday School, Modena, Pa., writes, requesting some prosperous Sunday School to send his school a gift of discarded books, which will be greatly appreciated.

Rev. E. O. Guerrant, of the Soul Winners' League, Wilmore, Ky., writes that the League has sent out ninety workers during the past year to proclaim the Gospel among the mountaineers.

Mrs. L. N. S., Baton Rouge, La., writes to know, from some MAIL-BAG reader, the name of the author of the verses beginning:

I place in thy young hands, my child,
A heaven-constructed chart.

Mrs. L. A. C., Oswego, N. Y., writes us that she has compiled from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to which she is a subscriber twenty-nine scrap-books, illustrated, giving a great variety of classified articles on home missions, foreign missions, work among children, Bible study, Oriental life, testimony of the mounds, temperance work, etc. She has these so arranged as to be convenient for ready reference. A capital suggestion for students.

THE "AMERICAN GIRL PICTURES" are a series of five charming drawings of the loveliest types of that fascinating personality—the modern American Girl. As drawings, they are distinctly different from anything else that has been done in this line. They possess that exquisite touch—that rare quality of sweetness and character—that makes you feel at once that you are looking at a person and not at a picture.

These beautiful pictures are published with the idea that every American woman will desire to possess them, and that, by sending complimentary copies to the purchasers of Borax, ever after the pictures would be associated with Borax. By this method our product would be made known in a pleasant way in the homes of American women everywhere. That this surmise is true is indicated by the thousands upon thousands of requests we have already had for these pictures.

It should be understood that the pictures are got up as elaborately as if they were to be sold through art stores, and that they are in every way representative of the modern engravers' art. They bear no advertising matter whatever.

The size of the pictures is 14 x 19 inches, and they are published on fine heavy plate paper for framing. They are pictures that will make a charming addition to a drawing-room, library or den.

We will send, carefully packed, a fine large reproduction of any of the series to any lady who will send us a box top from a pound box of "20-MULE-TEAM BRAND BORAX" (which can be bought at any grocery or drug store) and four (4) cents in stamps to cover cost of mailing. Indicate by number the picture you wish, and address "Department A, Pacific Coast Borax Co., New York City."

In passing, it may be well to say a word about Borax. The usefulness of Borax is not limited to the kitchen and laundry; the wise American girl has Borax in her bath, in her shampoo and on her toilet table. Borax water is the best cosmetic in the world. Try it a week and see how fine the texture of your skin will become, and how rosy your cheeks.

One secret of the wonderful quality of Borax throughout the house is because it softens the water. Water has to be soft to clean well, whether it is used on woodwork or silver or children.

Get Pure Borax, use it everywhere you use water, and you will know what real hygienic cleanliness is.

To avoid adulterations, order "20-MULE-TEAM BRAND."

Our Weekly Puzzle Competition

Conducted by A. B. R. Open to all Readers of "The Christian Herald"

All Solutions must be sent in on postal cards, and no other business should be mentioned

Mail your answer on the Monday following the date of this paper.

No communication post-marked before or after this particular Monday will be recognized, hence, in the consideration of solutions and the awarding of prizes, distance plays no part whatever.

250 prizes will be awarded to the first 250 correct answers.

In fairness to all, no communications will be examined until ten days after the date of mailing mentioned above.

Of course, under these circumstances, only subscribers within the boundaries of the United States proper, and the Dominion of Canada can successfully compete.

- The names of all who have correctly solved any of the puzzles will be published in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, whether they receive a prize or not.
- The prize for this week's puzzle will be a copy of How to Succeed, by Orison Swett Marden, sent all charges prepaid.
- Address all postal cards in this competition:

PUZZLE No. V.

A TRAVELER who had spent some time at the capital of a native king, was proceeding on his journey, when a messenger overtook him, saying: "The Book! The king wants the Book!" The desired volume, a copy of the Bible, was given to the messenger. From it the traveler had, a few days before, read the seventh chapter of Revelation, from the ninth verse to the end, which made a deep impression upon the king and his chiefs.

"Tell the white people," said the king, "that I am like a man sitting in the arkness or born blind. All I ask is that I may be taught to see, and I will be a Christian as long as I live." This appeal was sent to a daily paper, published in a great city. In response, money was quickly given to establish mission, and men offered themselves for the work. Thirty years later, the Christian Church in the country of this king, numbered 40,000 communicants.

CAME FROM COFFEE

A Case Where the Taking of Morphine Began With Coffee

"For 15 years," says a young Ohio woman, "I was a great sufferer from stomach, heart and liver trouble. For the last 10 years the suffering was terrible; it would be impossible to describe it. During the last three years I had convulsions from which the only relief was the use of morphine.

"I had several physicians, nearly all of whom advised me to stop drinking tea and coffee, but as I could take only liquid foods, I felt I could not live without coffee. I continued drinking it until I became almost insane; my mind was affected, while my whole nervous system was a complete wreck. I suffered day and night from thirst, and as water would only make me sick, I kept on trying different drinks, until a friend asked me to try Postum Food Coffee.

"I did so, but it was some time before I was benefited by the change, my system was so filled with coffee poison. It was not long, however, before I could eat all kinds of foods, and drink all the cold water I wanted and which my system demands. It is now 8 years I have drank nothing but Postum for breakfast and supper, and the result has been that in place of being an invalid, with my mind affected, I am now strong, sturdy, happy and healthy.

"I have a very delicate daughter who had been greatly benefited by drinking Postum, also a strong boy who would rather go without food for his breakfast than his Postum. So much depends on the proper cooking of Postum, for unless it is boiled the proper length of time, people will be disappointed in it. Those in the habit of drinking strong coffee should make the Postum very strong at first, in order to get a strong coffee taste." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

ZULUS TEACHING ZULUS

Industrial Education in Zululand

TEACHERS AND STUDENTS IN MR. DUBE'S INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL

NEWS that will gratify every reader interested in foreign missionary work comes from Zululand, where an effort has been in progress for some years to give the natives not only the Gospel of Christ, but such training in the arts of civilized life as to improve the condition of the country. The work, initiated by the missionaries, has received an impetus from the active interest of John L. Dube, a Zulu of high rank in his native land, who was educated in this country. He is first cousin of Chief Umqawe, one of the most powerful leaders among the Zulus, and a member of the late king's family. Mr. Dube was deeply impressed during his residence in the United States with the advantage it would be to his people to learn the American method of cultivating the soil, and to become adepts in American manufactures. In order to gain an insight into the best educational methods, he visited the Hampton Schools and the Institution under Booker T. Washington, at Tuskegee, and returned to Zululand, full of enthusiastic interest in industrial education.

Mr. Dube promptly established a small school on his return to Zululand. His funds were small, but sufficient for an experiment. He wished to ascertain whether his people were too conservative to adopt new methods. A very short period sufficed to demonstrate the attitude of the Zulus. The young people crowded to the school, eager for the knowledge he was anxious to impart. They proved docile and studious, and the success of the experiment is clearly proved. The first term opened with about seventy-five pupils, which were about twenty-five more than could be reasonably accommodated. Then additions were built, which have been crowded this term with 180 pupils, more than double their capacity, coming from the borders of Transvaal, Swaziland, Basutoland, Zululand and Natal. Mr. Dube has now returned to America to report progress, and to solicit help for an extension of his school. He gives some interesting incidents to show the value and prospects of the work.

"One boy," he says, "came to the school from a long distance, wearing dirty clothes, and as wild in appearance as a Zulu can be in savage state. He wanted an education. The first lesson we gave him was to go to the river with a piece of soap and wash himself. Now, the quick change that has taken place is simply wonderful. He reads his Bible, and works in the farm, and understands how to handle an American plough, so that when he returns home he will be a great help to his people.

"Some boys and girls come to us with nothing on but beads, and we have to teach them the first lessons in dress. Although I do not mean to say putting on civilized clothing indicates morality, still we find that the heathen invariably has a desire to cover his body as soon as he is converted.

"Chief Ponqwana, of the Zotyia tribe, who has been opposing our work, was softened by our mission girl making a white shirt for him.

"One incident which occurred there recently, is of a woman whose husband gave her permission to attend preaching service. She became converted and joined the mission church. When she refused to attend witch-dances, make beer for her husband, and eat meat offered to spirits, her husband beat her, and forced her to do these things against her will. She tried to pray in the hut, but her husband would not let her, so she went out to the fields, and attended divine service when she could. She kept praying for her husband until the Spirit of God touched his heart, and one day she was surprised to hear him say that she might go to the Jesus meetings, and offered to go with her. After a few weeks, he stood up and confessed his sins, and told how badly he had treated his wife. It was a joyful day for her, and for all the people. They are now both members of the Church."

Rev. W. C. Wilcox, of the American Board of Missions among the Zulus, has visited the school, and speaks in the highest terms of its success.

Mr. Dube has organized a committee in this country to advise him in the extension of his work, and to solicit funds for the erection of other buildings in which to carry it on. It is distinctly a missionary effort, in which Christianity occupies the first place; and, combined with it, is the industrial education, which, it is hoped, will lead to the development of the civilization of the people. Any contributions sent to this office, will be acknowledged in these columns, and forwarded to Mr. Dube's treasurer.

Jewish Persecution

COMPARATIVELY few Americans have any idea of the number and extent of the Jewish massacres that have occurred in Eastern Europe, even within the memory of the present generation.

The People, the Land and the Book (the New York Hebrew-Christian Magazine, Edited by B. A. M. Schapiro, and devoted to the interests of the ancient race throughout the world), in its current issue gives the following startling list of Jewish massacres in Russia:

April, 1881, Elisabethgrad; Elisabethgrad provinces; Jews in thirty-one villages slain; Goltz; Berwsouka and Annariw. April 1 to May 26. Jewish inhabitants in eight villages murdered; same date, Kiev, also Wassilkar, Faslon, Wassilen and three villages, all in Kiev province. Also in April, 1881, Province of Podolia, town of Schmerinka; eight villages in the neighborhood of Kiev. Province of Tschernigow, city of Kenolop and suburbs; and in the same province, nine villages. In May, 1881, in the same province, nine villages, Smela and twelve villages; same date, Province of Wolyn, city of Wolostchisk and four villages; Odessa and two villages; Province of Cheisone, Nikololejew and Orechow; Province of Jekatermoslanow, Alexandrowsk, twenty-seven villages and three Jewish agricultural colonies. Besides these there were three massacres in 1882, one in 1883 and three in 1884. These are exclusive of the frightful massacre at Kishineff.

There were widespread intimations of intended massacres at Kishineff and other Russian cities, this Easter, but the government, influenced by the sharp criticisms from other lands last year, has seen fit to prevent them thus far. Bulgaria is the latest scene of anti-Jewish outrages. Letters from Lompalanka state that mobs gathered and attacked the Jews of that place. The mobs gashed the sides of the Jews, drove nails in their hands and feet, and placed crowns of thorns on their heads. The Bulgarian Government suppressed the news, trying to prevent the antagonizing of international Jewish financiers, who frequently handle Bulgarian loans.

THE OLD MAN'S POSY

By Mary Lowe Dickinson

TOLD ye the spring-time was here, e'en a'most;
And you answered, 'I want to know!'
But I've fetched home sathin' that proves I'm right;
I found it under the snow:
'Tis a reg'lar May-flower, sweet and pink,
Just a-gittin' ready to blow.

"Hold on till I pull off my mittens, good wife,
And straighten this crick in my back;
'Rheumatiky folks ain't no right in the woods,'
Well, I own up, I be growin' slack;
Why I wouldn't thought nothin' a few years ago
Of givin' them pine-knots a whack.

"There's yer posy! The idees it put in my head
I bet yer ye couldn't have guessed;
You know, don't ye, wife? that I hev seen the day
When my choppin' was good as the best:
But neow 'fore I git 'nough to last us a spell
I jest want to scoot home and rest.

"Ain't yer kind er lonesome shet up with yer aches?
Though you'd never let on, I'll be beound,
You ain't one er that kind, Elviry, that makes
A man feel he mustn't set reound,
Nor I one a woman must pester and nag
To make him git over the ground.

"We're old and you're ailin'; but no one can say
We haven't worked airy and late;
'Tain't my fault nor yourn if there's money to pay.
And I've got to that contrairy state
Where the mortgage can stand on the house and the land,
And the rich folks that hold it kin wait.

"You're right! it sounds 'sassy'—I don't owe no grudge—
But, over that mortgage, I've sweat,
And you've worn to bones—a reg'lar drudge—
To git the old farm out of debt;
Neow my foot is set down, and I ain't goin' to budge,
The owner can't turn us out yet.

"Down yonder 'n the lot when I see that ere pink Jest peekin' and liftin' its head,
Somehow it fetched to me, as quick as a wink,
Your face, lyin' there on the bed;
And your eyes looked so lonesome, they jest made me think
Of all the hard life you had led.

"And I yanked up that posy and jest put for home,
As spry as I done years ago;
Seemed 's ef you'd be watchin' eout for me to come,
And, somehow, I reckoned you'd know
That I'd kinder dug up the old love—that gits num—
Bein' buried down under the snow.

"Under the load that has pestered us both
Till we lived the life of a slave,
Till you never hoped for nothin' but work,
Me nuther—this side er the grave;
And worried forever lest folks in debt
Salvation warn't meant to save.

"Now whether it is, or whether it ain't,
Is nuthin' to you nor me,
Mebbe it's Scripser, and mebbe 'tain't,
We've never hed time to see;
Some day we'll set down together and sarch
If that mortgage jest lets us be.

"'Live savin'!' Oh, yes, I will save you, wife,
From this tarnal worry and fret;
Mebbe the poor-house ends our life,
Though I'd be willing to bet
When folks sets down, beat out, to rest,
The good Lord lets 'em set!

"He ain't no debtor to drive and squeeze
As long as a body can go;
Or to turn us old folks out to freeze;
What's that you say? 'Jest so.'
'Tis Him that nusses sech flowers as these All winter under the snow."

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

Help for the Sleepless

HOW TO SLEEP, a little book by Marion M. George, will make interesting reading to many people, who spend weary hours in vain endeavors to find sleep. Hawthorne says in his Mosses from an Old Manse: "Were I to adopt a pet idea as so many people do, and fondle it in my embraces to the exclusion of all others, it would be that the great want which mankind labors under at this present period, is sleep." Few people properly value the blessing of sleep until they are deprived of it.

There never was a time when we could better realize the importance of the question, than now, when life seems to take on with each day added and ever increasing complexities. The "ravelled sleeve of care" seems to become more tattered every day, and in need of sleep's gentle mending. The author of The Witchery of Sleep says: "Most of the mischievous stories told about the ability of great men to do without sleep are untrue, and the foolish man who reads that Napoleon slept only three or four hours at night, and cuts down his own hours of sleep, might better open a vein and lose a quart of blood, than lose the sleep, which is life itself."

In the chapter devoted to "How to Secure Sleep," the author says: "Affairs of the day should never be carried into the night, which is nature's sleeping time. If you wish to sleep well, you must go to bed with a tranquil heart. Forget everything that has troubled you during the day. When you lay your head upon your pillow, fill your mind with peaceful, happy thoughts, no matter how unpleasant the day may have been, think glad thoughts. Let your last waking thought be one of gladness." This certainly is good advice, and the author recommends those inclined to worry at night, to learn the following lines by Phillips Brooks, and repeat them:

There's many a trouble
Would break like a bubble,
And into the waters of Lethe depart,
Did we not rehearse it
And tenderly nurse it,
And give it a permanent place in the heart.

There's many a sorrow
Would vanish to-morrow,
Were we but willing to furnish the wings;
But, sadly intruding,
And quietly brooding,
It hatches all sorts of horrible things.

The chapters on "Sleeping habits and hours," "Getting ready for bed," "Position in bed," "The furnishing of the bed-room," etc., are all filled with practical suggestions to those unfortunates, who toss and tumble all night long in a vain endeavor to sleep, and who arise in the morning more tired than when they went to bed.

BOOKS RECEIVED

The Man who Pleases and the Woman who Charms, by John A. Cone; a trim little helpful book on a variety of attractive topics—conversation, tact, attention, the voice, manners, dress, etc. Pp. 131, cloth, 50c. Hinds & Noble, New York, publishers.

The American Prisoner, a Romance of the West Country, by Eden Phillpotts. Illustrated. A capital story, full of incident, action, and tender romance. Pp. 506, cloth. Price $1.50. The Macmillan Co., New York and London, publishers.

What Shall I Do? by John S. Stoddard. A capital book for young people. It gives a very clear and suggestive outline of fifty profitable occupations from which to choose a life-calling. Illustrated. Pp. 276, cloth. Price $1. Hinds & Noble, New York, publishers.

Songs of all the Colleges, compiled by David B. Chamberlain (Harvard), and Karl P. Harrington (Wesleyan), is a book that will be welcomed by music lovers everywhere, and especially by college men. It contains all the musical wit and humor, nonsense, pathos and romance of college life. Well bound in cloth, quarto size, the scores clearly printed. Price $1.50. Hinds & Noble, publishers, New York.

The Social Unrest; Studies in Labor and Social Movements, by John Graham Brooks. This is a book dealing very exhaustively with some of the leading problems of our time, not only in the United States, but throughout the civilized world. By no means radical in his views, the writer sheds a light on the history and spread of modern socialism, which will help many to a clearer understanding. Pp. 394, paper covers, 25c. The Macmillan Co., London and New York, publishers.

Homophonic Conversations, by C. B. and C. V. Wait. This little book will be a helpful pocket companion for travelers. It is, as its title indicates, based upon the similarity in sound and in signification of the principal words used in the sentences. That this will aid the memory is undeniable. Cannot a person remember a word in a foreign language which sounds like one in his own and which means the same thing, more easily than he can one which sounds differently? When these like-sounding words have been learned, others of a different character can be substituted, the construction of the sentence remaining the same. The conversations are arranged under different headings: Salutation, The Time, The Weather, The News, etc. Also covering the various situations and emergencies of travel. Price $1.00. Published by C.V. Waite & Co., 479 Jackson Boulevard, Chicago.

HAS A SAY

T. School Principal Talks About Food

The Principal of a High School in a flourishing Calif. city says:

For 23 years I worked in the school with only short summer vacations. I formed the habit of eating rapidly, masticated poorly, which, coupled with my sedentary work, led to indigestion, liver trouble, lame back, and rheumatism.

Upon consulting physicians, some prescribed me with drugs, while others prescribed dieting, and sometimes I got temporary relief, other times not. For 12 years I struggled along with this handicap day work, seldom laid up, but often a burden to myself with lameness and rheumatic pains.

Two years ago I met an old friend, a physician who noticed at once my out-of-health condition, and who prescribed for me an exclusive diet of Grape Nuts, milk and fruit.

Following his instructions, and in two months I felt like a new man with no more headaches, rheumatism or liver trouble, and from that time to this, Grape Nuts has been my main food for morning and evening meals; am stronger and healthier than I have been for years, without a trace of the old troubles.

Judging from my present vigorous physical and mental state, I tell my people Methuselah may yet have to take second place among the old men, for I feel like I will live a great many more years.

To all this remarkable change in health I am indebted to my wise friend Dr. Grape Nuts, and I hope the Postum Co. will continue to manufacture this life and health giving food for several centuries yet, until I move to a world where indigestion is unknown." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Ask any physician what he knows about Grape Nuts. Those who have tried it now things.

There's a reason." Look in each pkg. for the famous little book, "The Road to Wellville."

WATCHFULNESS

Christ's Injunction to His People

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

OUR Lord taught his disciples the great lesson of living without anxiety about things temporal, because we have such a God, and in our God such a Father. And he sums up this lesson thus: "And seek not ye what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink, and live not in careful suspense [margin]. For all these things do the nations of the world seek after: and your Father knoweth that ye have need of these things. But rather seek ye the Kingdom of God; and all those things shall be added unto you." True watching is all-absorbing.

One who truly watches for the Lord watches "more than they that watch for the morning." One who is constantly occupied with himself is always full of fears. He cannot look with a single eye to the Lord's return. His eye is so occupied within, that it is not free to look without, and watch for the Morning Star. He that is filled with the wondrous truth of the Father's good pleasure to give the Kingdom to the most unworthy and undeserving, because he sees them, and accepts them, in the Beloved (Eph. 1:6), is free from his fears to look out, and watch, for the coming of the Lord.

Then our Lord says, "Let your loins be girded about, and your lights burning, and ye yourselves like unto men that wait for their lord, when he shall return from the wedding; that when he cometh and knocketh they may open to him immediately" (ver. 35). There is but one Scriptural girding of the loins—"Having your loins girt about with truth" (Eph. 6:14). Anything which is not transparent is a hindrance to the true spirit of watching for the Lord. How can anyone truly watch for him whose eyes are "as a flame of fire" (Rev. 1:14) if he has something in his heart and life which he is seeking to hide? He cannot watch with girded loins; he is not meet for the Master's use. And "lights burning." If our spiritual life is running so low that people have to inquire whether we are children of light, it is impossible for us to be really on the watch for our Lord. No one who has eyes can mistake where a light is, if it is really burning.

It is easy to say, "I am of a reserved disposition, and am not in the habit of talking about these holy things." But you would be if your heart were full of them, for Jesus says, "Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh" (Matt. 12:34). "If thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved" (Rom. 10:9). When the disciples were filled with the Holy Ghost, they said, "We cannot but speak the things which we have seen and heard" (Acts 4:20). If you can be silent about these things, is it not a proof that you are not filled with the Spirit? If you do not confess Christ with your mouth, is it not a proof that you do not believe on him in your heart, but only in your head? And is it not true that you are not watching for the coming of the Lord? Are there not in your heart expectations of marriage, of pleasure, of riches, or of some other earthly hope, which take up far more of your time and thoughts than the coming of the Lord?

Much is spoken in sermons, and much is sung in hymns, about being ready for death. But death is never set before us as that which we are to look for. It is always the coming of the Lord. "If I go and prepare a place for you," said our Lord to his disciples before his sufferings, "I will come again, and receive you unto myself, that where I am, there ye may be also" (John 14:3). No mention of death. This is our expectation; to be with him. He had already said, "Where I am, there shall also my servant be" (John 12:26); and in his last great prayer he prayed, "Father, I will that they also which thou hast given me, be with me where I am, that they may behold my glory, which thou hast given me, for thou lovedst me before the foundation of the world" (John 17:24). The heart's longing to be with him is but to reciprocate the longing of his heart to have us where he is.

Crooked Spines Made Straight

If you are suffering from any form of spinal trouble, you can be relieved in your own home without pain or discomfort. A wonderful anatomical appliance has been invented by a man whose spine was curved for thirty years. By the use of this invention his spine was straightened. It is nature's own method. It has never yet failed. The old methods of torture are deemed forever. The scientific and medical world is amazed at the marvelous results. Physicians in hospitals and in private practice are endorsing it. The new discovery relieves the pressure at the affected parts of the spine, the spinal cord is invigorated and strengthened, the cartilage between the vertebrae expands and the spine is straightened.

There is light hope for all, no matter how long you have suffered. We have strong testimonials from every state in the Union. The appliances are being sent all over the world. Each one is made from individual measurements and fits perfectly. There is positively no inconvenience in wearing.

We guarantee satisfaction or refund your money at the end of thirty days' trial.

SPECIAL NOTICE

All letters for the "Mail-Bag" must contain the name and address of the writer, not for publication, but so that an answer may be sent by mail if necessary.

Paul L., Albion, Mich. What was the immigration to the United States last year and the year before?

Inquirer, Oxford, Pa. What are the doctrines of the Reformed Dutch Church, to which the Heidelberg Catechism, which is one of the standards, agrees in the main with the Shorter Catechism, and is very clear in its declaration against the doctrine of transubstantiation, and against the Lutheran belief on the same subject. The government of the church is also akin to that of the Presbyterian Church. The Consistory, the Classis, and the Synods are similar to the Presbytery, the Synod, and the Assembly, though with some differences in details.

Practically they differ but little from those of the Presbyterian Church. Moderate Calvinism is usually preached, and in all essentials the church is evangelical. Pastors pass without change of creed from the Reformed to the Presbyterian Church, or vice versa. The Heidelberg Catechism, which is one of the standards, agrees in the main with the Shorter Catechism, and is very clear in its declaration against the doctrine of transubstantiation, and against the Lutheran belief on the same subject. The government of the church is also akin to that of the Presbyterian Church. The Consistory, the Classis, and the Synods are similar to the Presbytery, the Synod, and the Assembly, though with some differences in details.

O. J. B., Lincoln, Neb. 1. When were cards first introduced and by whom? 2. If a sanctified person should be assaulted would it be right for him to return the blow?

1. They are said to be of remote Chinese origin. Another account is, that they were invented and introduced in Europe in mediæval times for the amusement of an insane King of France. 2. See Luke 6: 29, and parallel passages.

E. R., Mounds, Ill. What did Christ mean in Luke 7: 26, where he said, speaking of John the Baptist, "The least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he?" Are we to understand that the Christians of to-day are greater than he was?

Commentators agree that the point of comparison is not a personal one. It relates rather to John's relative standing or position in the economy of grace. He was far in advance of all who had preceded him in his clear vision of the Messiah's coming and the fulfillment of prophecy; yet those who were with Christ, as believers at that time, were greater in the sense that they knew and experienced that which John had only foreshadowed. He stood above the prophets in the old dispensation and beneath those of the new.

J. J. R., Mobile, Ala. 1. What is a "Cheshire cat," and is the term used in any sense denoting characteristics? 2. In books printed in the eighteenth century, I find the first word on each page printed at the bottom of the preceding page. Why was that done?

1. Cheese was formerly sold in Cheshire, England, moulded in the form of a cat, with its teeth a-grin. Hence the term, "grinning like a Cheshire cat." 2. It was an old custom, originating with the practice among attorneys and scribes of putting the "catchword" at bottom of every page in title-deeds and similar documents.

Reader, London, Ont. Where was the soul of Christ during the interval between his death on the cross and his resurrection?

In the absence of definite statements of Scripture, we cannot answer the question, save by inference. There is Christ's own promise to the thief (Luke 23: 43), "To day thou shalt be with me in Paradise," but that he meant by the word Paradise the place we call heaven, does not appear probable, in view of his remark to Mary (John 20: 17), "I am not yet ascended to my Father." Neither could he have meant the place we call hell, in spite of Peter's assertion (1 Peter 3: 19) that "he went and preached unto the spirits in prison," for such a prospect would not have comforted the thief. We are, therefore, forced to the conclusion that there is an abode of disembodied spirits, known to theologians as the "intermediate state," in which, as an ante-chamber of heaven, the soul remains for a period, in rest and preparation for the full enjoyment of heavenly bliss. It may have been from such an abode that Lazarus was recalled, when Christ raised him from the dead; and it may have been of such a place that Paul speaks (II. Cor. 12: 4), wherein in a trance, as a foretaste of heaven, he heard "unspeakable things." To such a place Christ's spirit may have gone, and it may be to that he alluded, when he told John (Rev. 1: 18), that he had "the keys of hades and of death."

George Frisbee, Sr., long a reader of this journal, writes:

What a beautiful history could be written—"The History of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD; from its inception to the present time." I have a long file of the paper. It is a grand cyclopedia of modern history. With it I converse with the great minds of the past, who have fought their battles against satanic influences, and wrought out through persecution or affliction a glorious transfiguration, made havoc on the middle wall of partition between sin and holiness, won the victory, and gone "through the gates" to glory, shouting their battle cry, "I sistent with the declaration that "God is a Spirit, whom no man hath seen or can see."

T. R. G., Goshen, N. Y. Speaking of a repugnant person, we frequently hear the expression, "Look for the cloven foot." What is its meaning and origin?

It means simply, look out for some knavish intention or some base motive. The allusion, of course, is to Satan, who is represented with cloven feet, like those of a goat.

J. G. B., Lebanon, Pa. What is the present religious condition of Ethiopia?

The Ethiopia of the Bible is now merely a geographical expression, and no longer exists as a distinct country. It included practically the whole of Africa south of Egypt, viz.: Nubia, Senaar, Kordofan, Abyssinia, the for it. As you will see in the preceding volume, Christ breathed on them and said, "Receive ye the Holy Ghost." That was no meanless act, as is sufficiently proved by their subsequent lives. The timidity which led them all to forsake Christ, disappeared, and we find them working miracles, preaching boldly, going to prison and to death for Christ. Perhaps such men as they became, might safely trusted with the power to forgive sins, though it is not certain (see Gal. 2: 17). In any case there is no proof that the authority they had, whatever it may have been, could be transmitted to others. Some of the Popes and Cardinals, certainly, were not the kind of men whose words were likely to be ratified in heaven.

Subscriber, Calvin, Ark. 1. Are the righteous converted persons to be judged the same as wicked? 2. Will the sins they committed before their conversion be exposed before all the world? 3. Is it a converted person's duty to confess publicly the sins of which he has been guilty?

1. The judgment of the righteous, in Christ, will be only for the apportionment of reward. There will be some who will have an abundant entrance, while others are without so to their ministry. "One star differeth from another star in glory" (1 Cor. 15: 41). 2. Confession of sins of those whom he has given through Christ. "They shall not be mentioned unto him" (Ezek. 18: 22). 3. It is not his duty, and indeed would do harm, to confess should be made to God. If he wronged any one and can make restitution, confession and restitution should be made to the injured person, but no useful purpose would be served by a public confession.

Mrs. B. A., Wellesley Hills, Mass. Should a child be pushed in its studies, when there seems to be a lagging interest on the scholar's part? a decided disinclination toward school? Should it be a matter of anxiety, such a child, at the age of twelve, is behind others of the same age, in the more advanced studies?

The most rapid growth in the height of a child, is between the ages of twelve and fourteen. At this time the brain lags, and does not develop in proportion to the growth of the body. From seventeen to nineteen, grows faster, and, at twenty, reaches a more rapid development. This accounts for the well-known fact, that pupils whose studies have been deferred until they are nearly quite full-grown, require much less time than others to complete their education. A child should not be overtaxed at the time of his rapid physical development. Many a bright future has been dimmed by pushing and cramming at this period.

D. R. P., Salem, Ore. What does it mean to believe on the Lord Jesus Christ? Believe what?

It means to put your faith in him, as a man afflicted with a critical disease might put his case in the hands of a physician; or a criminal under a capital charge might put his case in the hands of a lawyer. It means more than either of these, but these will give you a clue to the meaning. If you realize that you are a sinner, and have broken God's law and are in danger of punishment—as you must do—you listen to your conscience—you naturally want to know if you can be forgiven, and if you are forgiven, whether there is some way of avoiding a repetition of your offences. Christ undertakes both, for those who will come to him. Only in coming to him, you must be sorry for what you have done and resolve, in his strength, to work with him for your own deliverance. You must obey his commands and study his character in the hope of becoming like him. Like a child at school, you must believe in your teacher and trust yourself wholly to him.

New York's Finnish Mission

A strong effort is now being made to build up the Finnish Mission Church in Harlem, which Rev. G. Blomgren is pastor. A concert in aid of the church is announced to be held in the Pilgrim Church, One Hundred and Twenty-first street and Madison Avenue, New York, at which many prominent artists will appear.

PUZZLE No. VI.

A KING who had made a journey to another land, was invited in a certain city to attend the anniversary service of a Christian Church. Twenty-nine years before, Christian subjects of the king, though but recently evangelized, had contributed one thousand dollars for foreign missions in this land, and the sum had been used towards the building of the church.

At the anniversary, the king was requested to carry to his people the hearty thanks of those who were now enjoying the gift; a copy of the New Testament was presented to him, and he made an appropriate address in response.

? In what city did this incident occur? Who was the king? ?

The Kaiser's Visit to Gibraltar

. . . By FREDERICK WEISS . . .

LEFT Tangier, Morocco, for a few days, to come to Gibraltar and help in holding services with the Salvation Army. They have an excellent work here at this fortress, and every week witnesses some wonderful instances of inquirers who find peace believing. At the Army Hall meetings are held every night at 8 o'clock.

The English Channel fleet is present now. A few days ago Emperor William of Germany visited Gibraltar and made a three days' stay. He has now gone further east to visit other places.

In the course of his Mediterranean tour, Emperor William has visited Naples and many other points of interest. His magnificent reception at Gibraltar, and the cordial hospitality he experienced while here, must have impressed him with a due sense of the value Englishmen attach to German friendship. Of late years, the Mediterranean has become somewhat of a popular touring resort for royalty, and many have come to the famous fortress, but to none has been extended a more kindly and hospitable greeting than that which awaited the Kaiser when his vessels anchored in the harbor. The photographs which appear on these pages show the royal visitor and his aides in the escort of the officers of the fortress who afforded him every facility to examine its wonders and inspect its defences. He visited the great dockyards, where Chief Engineer Cole explained the nature of the improvements now going on. Of course there were the usual military and naval turn-outs in honor of the imperial guest, and both on land and water the occasion of his visit was made in every way as agreeable and memorable as possible.

The soldiers on the Rock number about 6,000, and whenever the fleet is here and the sailors come ashore, the Christian workers find plenty to do. At the Salvation Army Hall the soldier boys hear the Gospel through St. Captain Pike and wife, who have built up an excellent work here.

Gibraltar, the mons calpe of the ancients, one of the pillars of Hercules, of which the other was Mount

Abyla, or Apes Hill in Africa (Monte Almina), was first known to the Phœnicians, and it is referred to and described by both Greek and Roman writers. There is little doubt that it was uninhabited until the Mohammedan invasion of Spain, which established an infidel oblong form, running nearly due north and south, and is about three miles in length, its greatest breadth being three-quarters of a mile, and its circumference about seven miles. The entire acreage of Gibraltar, including the north front, is 1,266 acres, of which over twenty-one acres only (public property), are reserved as garden ground. There are, however, other spots cultivated in private properties and government quarters. The greater part of the Rock is incapable of cultivation. On the north, it is connected with the mainland by a low, sandy isthmus, 1,500 yards in length, and from 950 to 1,800 yards in breadth in different parts. On the western side, where the town is built, the slope is gradual in most parts; but the eastern, which faces the Mediterranean, is an inaccessible cliff, bare of vegetation, and forming a series of rugged precipices, broken only in one spot by an immense bank of sand, 450 feet in height, the accumulation of many ages, which lies heaped up under Signal Station Hill. At the northern face, the mountain rises in a perpendicular and unbroken cliff to a height of nearly 1,400 feet, terminating in a narrow plateau, crowned with a powerful battery. At its extreme height, the Rock is marked by three points, viz.: At the north, the Rock Gun or "Wolf's Crag," 1,250 feet; in the centre, the Upper Signal Station, 1,255 feet high; and at the south, Sugar-Loaf Hill or "O'Hara's Tower," 1,408 feet high. The greatest height is in the neighborhood of "Ape's Hill," 2,808 feet. The Rock is composed of compact limestone, or gray, dense marble, varied by beds of red sandstone.

Though Gibraltar has been thought by many to be only a barren rock, its floral and vegetable varieties are sufficiently rich to occupy the attention of botanists. The geranium, aloe and rose run wild, and the myrtle, locust tree, a great variety of cactus, the vine, fig-tree, olive, almond, orange and lemon are present in various localities. The city consists of two distinct portions, known as north and south, the former being most important, as it includes the commercial portion, which dynasty in that country for upwards of 800 years. On this Rock the Moors first landed, and from here, when the Christian arms had regained supremacy, the last remnant of a glorious empire retired into Barbary. Gibraltar may be described as a bold headland or promontory, jutting insularly into the sea at the entrance of the Mediterranean. It is separated by a ridge from north to south, dividing it into two unequal parts. It is a peninsula of

Multiplying Methodism

Text—Ezekiel 16: 7: "I have caused thee to multiply as the bud of the field."

EARLY twenty years ago I was with my father in a hotel in London, when a deputation of Methodist ministers and laymen waited on him. They said: "Will you not preach for us at least once before you return to America? There are thousands and tens of thousands of people in London who have for years been readers of your sermons, and they want to hear your voice and touch your hand. They have a right to make this demand. You are part of them, and we cannot go until you consent to preach at least once." We were on our way to the continent, to meet my mother and sisters, who had preceded us there some months before. "No," answered my father. "I cannot at the present time. I am mentally and physically worn out. The doctors have told me I must hold up. I am going to the continent, where my lips will be closed, because I do not understand the French and the German languages. But if you wish, I will preach for you when I return." "Where would you like to preach, Doctor?" With that my father turned and said, "As I am to preach but once, I have but one desire, and that is to preach in John Wesley's pulpit."

"Why do you want to preach in City Road Chapel?" I asked, after the delegation had departed. "That church holds only a few hundred. Why not go to one of the great buildings, like Joseph Parker's church, or Exeter Hall, where you can have an audience of thousands of hearers." "Because," was the reply, "I consider that City Road Chapel is in some respects the most sacred spot in all Europe. That is the place where John Wesley is buried. That is the pulpit from which went forth a mighty power, which is felt in every land to-day. The influence of that pulpit is potent in every Methodist Church and meeting-house and Sunday School the world over, affecting the lives of twenty-five millions of the human race, who, every Lord's Day, assemble under Methodist auspices to worship God and study his Word. John Wesley built City Road Chapel. He spent the latter part of his stationary ministry in City Road Chapel, and his presence is enshrined there."

The Founder's Greatness

Lord Macaulay, in one of his essays, declares that John Wesley had a greater natural genius for government than had Richelieu. The great historian believed that in these words he was giving the eminent divine the highest praise, but I could see that my father's estimate far transcended that of Macaulay, and that he held Wesley in higher honor than that of any statesman, living or dead. The whole Christian world is in accord in that estimate, and as it recognizes the achievements of the church which John Wesley founded, it thanks and praises God for that beneficent life.

The name of John Wesley is everywhere respected by the good and the true. Therefore, it is to be wondered at that our people, no matter to what Protestant Church they belonged, hailed with joyful acclaim the news that the Methodist General Conference of 1904 was to assemble in the "City of the Angels." This Conference opens its session during the coming week. We, as a people, look forward to its sessions with interest and hope. We believe that by close touch, this Conference will bless all Protestant Churches no matter to what denomination they belong. It is appropriate on this Sabbath day, to bid the incoming delegates welcome. It is also appropriate to state some of the reasons why the little band of followers with which John Wesley surrounded himself, has grown in numbers, until to-day it outnumbers in membership every other individual Protestant Church in America and in the world.

First—her genesis. In order to study the marvelous multiplying power of Methodism, let us analyze the conditions attendant upon her birth. We must find upon what troublous waters her cradle was rocked, and search out the place of her infancy, even as the Egyptian princess found the future emancipator of the Hebrew race sleeping in a willow basket among the bullrushes of the river Nile. Every great movement in history has been the product of the condition of the time of its birth. God, in his providence, has ordained that the prevalence of unrighteousness in a nation shall so stir the souls of his people, that they will gather in his name around the standard of some leader whom he raises up to witness for him.

What were the conditions of the nation at the time of the birth of the Methodist Church? Did she come into the world as a protest to the sins of a corrupt English court? Oh yes. In no time of English history have bribery and debauchery run more riot than during Robert Walpole's occupancy of the English premiership. He was the author of the famous and hateful sentence in reference to the House of Commons, "All these men have their price." What Robert Walpole in statecraft could not win by fair means, he won by foul. But Methodism came into the world to do a greater work than merely to protest against governmental depravity. It came, as Josiah Strong has said, as a protest against an Established Church, which believed, at that time, more in outward ceremonies than in spiritual truths. "Isaac Taylor," so records the author of The Next Great Awakening, "calls the church of this period 'a fair carcass,' and Blackstone says that he went to hear every preacher of note in London, and that there was not one whose discourse indicated whether he was a follower of Confucius, or Mohammed, or of Christ." The Established Church of that time believed in carrying the phylacteries upon the forehead, but not in practicing Christ's spiritual lessons in the life. It was so given over to formalism and rites and ceremonies, that it had no warning to give, even to men in its pulpits, who, like the Pharisees of old were whited sepulchres, fair to the eye, but within, harboring decaying corpses and whose private lives were a repulsive stench. "It is the inward witness, son, spake the dying father, Rev. Samuel Wesley, to his son John—"this is the strongest proof of Christianity." So John Wesley and his followers resolutely set their faces against the prevalent sins of that day. They vehemently declared that the Christian Church should not only have a pure creed, but that its members should be men of pure private lives. In the high spiritual standard set before the individual church members, we find the chief cause of the marvelous development of the Methodist Church.

"The Inward Witness"

My brother, it is of vital importance, that all Protestant Churches realize that they are making a fatal error when they in any way compromise their high spiritual standards by alliance with sin. The higher the standard of the Christian Church, the greater will be its success. We do not need, to-day, churches that honor wine-bibbing ministers. We do not need churches which, when they have a church sociable, tell their young people they may dance and play cards. We do not desire churches whose members in their every-day actions are nowise different from the people of the world. One of the reasons why the Christian Endeavor Society, of which Francis E. Clark is the president, is numbering its members by the hundreds of thousands and the millions, is because of its iron-clad pledge. John Willis Baer, who for so many years was secretary of that young people's Christian organization, was right, when, in my presence some years ago, he declared: "The high standard of the character of the Endeavorers is due to the high standard of the Society's pledge." You can never raise a sin-struck world if you are wallowing in the sinful mud of the world yourself. Like John Wesley and the Methodist Church, lift the world out of sin by making your Christian standard as high as heaven and as pure as Christ himself. "It is the inward witness, son, the inward witness—this is the strongest proof of Christianity." It is the inward witness of the purity of its members which accounts for the multiplying powers of the Methodist Church of to-day. Methodism came into the world as a protest against prevalent sin.

Emancipating the Pew

This fact alone does not tell all the story of its marvelous multiplying power. There are many other reasons for the growth of Methodism; one of the chief of these is the fact that John Wesley was the emancipator of the laymen, as Martin Luther was the emancipator of the Bible. The English ecclesiastic opened the dumb lips of the pew. The German reformer broke the iron clasps holding together the lids of the Word of God, which barred to all but ordained priests, access to the life-giving message that God sent for the deliverance of all his sinful children. John Wesley said to the blacksmith at his forge, and the cobbler on his bench, and the wife in her kitchen, "Go forth and be my evangelists. You may not be graduates of theological seminaries, but you can testify of Christ's love." Martin Luther said: "There, laymen, is the open Bible. Read it. Ponder it. Study it. Read it with your own eyes and kiss it with your own lips." Do you wonder that when John Wesley built the Methodist Church upon an open Bible, and then in public meeting, set all his people testifying of God's word and love, he became one of the greatest Gospel reformers of the ages?

John Wesley, because he sent forth the common people preaching and praying everywhere, was, in derision, called a "Methodist." He was sneered at, because in his day custom dictated that no man should pray in public unless he read his prayer out of a printed prayer-book, or speak for Christ, unless he was entitled to wear a cassock and bands of an ordained priest. But John Wesley removed these restrictions, for the Methodists, and sent the laymen forth preaching and singing, as in the latter years Archibald Tait, Archbishop of Canterbury, enlisted the services of unordained workers in various branches of church activity and earned for himself the title, given him in scorn by a jealous clergy, of "The Archbishop of the L. Y." There, upon his monument in old Canterbury, is inscribed in the most beautiful of epitaphs, "The one aim of his life was to make the Church of England the Church of the people." Oh, my friends, let us hold fast this liberty of service. The work of propagating the Gospel is not committed exclusively to any one class or profession. The laborers sent forth by Wesley the eighteenth century, like the laymen enlisted by Archbishop Tait in the nineteenth, had a work to do and right earnestly and successfully they did it. I never allow the pew to again be shackled and it is sealed with the silence of death. What we need more and more in the beginning of this twentieth century, is not a better educated ministry, but one which will art forth a speaking and a testifying pew. The simple act is some of our churches are being preached to. We need not more classical sermons, but more and more the good old-fashioned testimony meetings of the Methodist Church. We need men and women who, in the simple, homely language of the street, can tell what God has done for their souls. We need our prayer-meetings to be truly "People's Meetings" in which all take part. A place where the old folks will testify and the middle-aged people will testify, and when the young people will testify.

Beneficent Organization

Another great cause for the multiplying power of Methodism, is the "class system." This "class system" so called, dates its historic birth to the 15th day of February, 1742. Like the life of the "Wandering Jew," it may it never have a death. May this system live on and on until at last earthly time shall cease, and the struggles against sin shall be swallowed up in the eternal conquests of heaven!

This was how the famous "class system" of Methodism was born. John Wesley and his brother Charles were visiting their society in the city of Bristol. A large financial indebtedness hung as an incubus over that society's place of worship. While the members of that society were discussing with the leaders how they should lift the debt, a Captain Foy arose, and proposed that each member should be taxed one penny a week until the debt was paid. "But that is not some one protestingly said. "Here are some people who are so poor they cannot afford to give even a penny." "Then," said Captain Foy, "put eleven of the poorest with me, and if they can give anything, I will call upon them weekly and collect the same, and if they give nothing, I will give for them, as well as for myself. And each of you can call on eleven of your neighbors weekly; receive what they give and make up what is wanting." No sooner had Captain Foy spoken than, in a flash, a divine inspiration came to John Wesley. "Yes, yes," said the great leader to himself, "that is just what Methodism needs, a system of care for its own. A system by which its members shall not be herded together, as wild animals are herded together; but a system which will single men out and place them in circle of tens. And over these circles shall be placed a separate leader, who will have charge of the class." These leaders in turn were to meet and report to their pastors. Their pastors in turn to-day, meet and report to their presiding elders. Each man, by the "class system" of Methodism, is responsible to some individual person of the church.

Individual Responsibility

We see the value of individual responsibility in the temporal world. Why should we not see the same results from the "class system" of Methodism? My boy is about sixteen years of age. Where are you going to send the lad to college? "Well," you say, "I would like in many ways to send him to one of our great universities; but the trouble is, I am afraid. There the boy will only be lost among a crowd of hundreds of other students, and no one will be individually responsible for the lad. I think I shall send him to one of our smaller colleges, where he will come in close contact with his teachers, and these teachers will be able to keep their eye upon him." You send your boy to small college to secure the individual touch of a

OUR PILGRIMS ON MARS' HILL

AFTER Madeira, a day in Gibraltar, another day at Algiers, and then the island of Malta (Melita) is reached, and our 800 pilgrims to the World's Sunday School Convention in Palestine at last find themselves upon scenes connected with the Bible. We are up at four o'clock in the morning, trying to see in the darkness the place where Paul was wrecked. We are disappointed not being able to identify it, and so our good captain decides to sail around by St. Paul's Bay, so called, as we leave the island in the evening. The whole island appears like a mass of solid buildings, constructed of slightly tinted orange stone, so soft when quieted that it is turned into balustrades and ornamentation. Interest centres not so much in Viletta, the superb capital, as in Citta Vecchia (pronounced Cheeta Vekkia), which Gates of Roberts College, Constantinople. Acts 17:22, to end of chapter. Sermon by Dr. John Potts of Toronto. Text: Acts 17:18. Solo.

Dr. Potts, the preacher, spoke of Paul as the greatest preacher of the First century, and, next to Jesus Christ, the greatest man who ever lived: the greatest in scholarship, in masterful eloquence, in moral heroism, in the Christ-like grace of humility. He called himself not only the "least of all the apostles," but the "least of all saints." Paul's audience that day on Mars' Hill was composed of philosophers and others, who asked of each other the question: "What will the babbler say?" He chose for his theme a wide-world subject, the resurrection of Jesus. Standing in the same place, nearly twenty centuries later, Dr. Potts took the same theme.

MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS.

means "the old city." St. Paul's Bay is about seven miles below the city, and many would have driven there but for the promise of the captain to sail close by.

In another quarter of the old city, we visit a noble cathedral, built of the same delicately-tinted stone. The gems in it are life-size portraits of the Apostles Paul and Peter, one on either side of the high altar. It is claimed that the cathedral is built on the site of the house of Publius, whose father, Paul cured of a fever; so, in a way, the cathedral becomes a monument to the apostle, for it is only that his name is linked with Paul, that Publius has any interest in Christian memory. A magnificent marble monument to Paul is erected at St. Paul's Bay. Second only to the interest felt in what concerns St. Paul, are the relics of the Knights of Malta. We visit the Museum containing these in the Governor's Palace, and look upon the armor which the Knights wore, and then we cross over to the church of St. John the Baptist and examine the floor, which is covered with memorial tablets in memory of those knights. As we sail out of Malta, we find nearly every one has possessed himself of a Maltese cross.

It is five o'clock in the afternoon as we sail away from Viletta; in half an hour we slowly pass the entrance to St. Paul's Bay and plainly discern the place where "two seas met." Sunday, March 27, at 10 A.M., found our company of eight hundred seated upon Mars' Hill. Rising up almost against us to a lofty height, is the Acropolis, crowned with the Parthenon, which, even in decay, is incomparable. The low hill on which we are seated, hardly more than sixty feet high, has the larger place in our interest. For grandeur we might have gathered upon the Acropolis, or upon a still higher mountain close by, on which are the remains of the "Pnyx," formerly a town meeting-place for the people. But our hearts were on Mars' Hill, because the Apostle Paul had stood there, and preached a living God to the men of Athens, who ignorantly worshiped other gods. We seat ourselves on the hillside as did the hearers on that day, but a different spirit is in us. We desire not as they did, to hear a new thing, but the old, old story of Jesus and his love. The service opens; announced by President E. K. Warren. Hymn: "All Hail the Power of Jesus' Name." Prayer by Dr. Lowden of Rhode Island. Scripture reading in concert, led by President feet upon the boy. "Think not," said President Haber, only a short time ago, "that the University of Chicago is in any sense a rival of the small college. There is not a professor upon our faculty who would be so foolish as to advocate the idea that young boys of sixteen should be turned loose in this great sinful city, with no one to be individually responsible for them. Chicago University is distinctively a post-graduate institution. We have our collegiate department for the sons and daughters of those parents living in town, and no or those whose homes are in the far distance."

Now, the "class system" of Methodism has a double purpose: First, it makes the Methodist convert a member of a great Gospel University, in which there are hundreds of thousands and millions of members. It gives to that convert the enthusiasm which truly comes from great numbers; and secondly, it separates the Methodist convert from the masses. It places him in a Gospel family for which some one is responsible. It gives to him a separate Gospel garden in which to labor. Individual responsibilities for individuals. That is the great multiplying slogan of the Methodist "class system." For whom, oh Christian man, are you responsible? Christ's name?

The Methodist Church, in the next place, is a singing church, whose songs are nearly always keyed to the tune of hope and joy and the glorious harmonies of a blessed hereafter. It is a church whose music is filled with hallelujah choruses and battle hymns and inspiring marching melodies. It is a church which believes that on hanks and gratitude for blessings received can be returned to God as well when standing upon our feet, as in the words of the Psalmist, "singing unto the Lord," as when on bended knee we offer them in silent prayer in the closet. The trouble with many of our churches is they always imagine Christ as keeping step to the slow time of a dirge; but they cannot imagine his moving lips as joining in a Wedding March, or in the joys of a social gathering.

Daniel Webster once said, "The proof to me that the church was established by God is found in the fact that it has existed in spite of the begowned ministers, who have been caged up to preach their sermons behind their repellent pulpits. Any lawyer would be ruined if he were compelled to plead for his client behind a wooden box, as the minister by custom is compelled to plead for his Christ." Whether that statement is true or no, I am not here to discuss. But one of the great facts that convinces me that the church is a divine institution is that it has existed for hundreds of years, in spite of the sepulchral and awful hymns with which the choirs used to lead in the song worship.

But while the Methodist Church has its songs in the minor key, for the most part the Methodist songs are songs of life and joy and hope. Go if you will with me to any of the great Methodist camp-meeting resorts of this country, and you will know of what I speak. The mightiest shout ever raised by conquering host upon battle-field, was never more triumphant than are the camp-meeting songs of Des Plaines or Ocean Grove. When the Methodists sing, "We are marching to Zion," they sing it in such a way that it seems to fling wide open the gates of the Heavenly City. Songs! Songs!

Lastly, Methodism has had its marvelous and miraculous multiplying power, because it has had an infinite field in which to labor. It has worked for the most part among the common people. Certain churches in this world have been known as churches of a class. Some churches have been known as churches which appealed to the greatest amount of brains in almost every Christian community. Other churches have been known as the churches of the aristocracy. But though John Wesley had as much brain as any man of his generation, and though by political preferment he could have reached a position of influence in aristocratic society, yet he chose to cast his lot among the common people. He did not believe there was one Gospel for the rich and another for the poor—one for the brainy man and another for him of small mental calibre. John Wesley believed all classes should meet as one at the throne of grace. Therefore, as the common people crowded around him to receive his message, many of the rich and the affluent stayed away. He was truly the missionary to the middle and lower classes. Are we in church work ready to reach out in Christ's name for the conversion of the same kind of people?

It was said of our Lord that "the common people heard him gladly." Ah, that is the best encomium that can be placed upon the tomb of the founder of Methodism! When Peter Cartwright, many years ago, arose to preach in Tennessee, some one whispered to him: "Gen. Jackson is in your audience." With that Peter Cartwright turned and said: "I hear that Gen. Jackson is in this audience. But I want to say to Gen. Jackson, that I have no Gospel for him any different from that which I offer to every man." Then in a voice of thunder, Cartwright cried: "Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish! General Jackson, that message is for you. Poor man, that message is for you." So, to-day, John Wesley, in his old pulpit, like Peter Cartwright, in vision, is to-day stretching out his arms over the whole sinful world, crying: "Repent! Repent! Repent!" And at the same time he is calling: "Come to the mercy seat, come, come!"

God bless John Wesley's memory. God bless all Methodists and Methodism. Delegates to the General Conference of 1904, in Christ's name, we bid you welcome. Ay, we open our hearts and greet you with ten thousand Christian salutations. May you always love us in the spirit with which we greet you on this Sabbath day.

The Woman's Relief Corps

WHEN the breezes of South Carolina were parted by the shrieking shot on that fateful spring morning in 1861, then began the need of the tender ministrations of women, which have gone on with increasing loyalty to a purpose as the years have gone by, and as the veterans, who saved the country in her dire distress, have grown feebler and grayer, and their families have needed friends in trouble or sickness. Even as the call went forth, the women, too, arose, and in the strength of a mighty purpose, answered, "Here am I," and not waiting for a response to come, turned to do the "next thing," which was the succoring of those who were marching away in the full vigor of manhood. There were those who could only "stand and wait," the anxious mothers, mayhap with children at the knee to be fed and cared for, while the mainstay was at the front, but who shall say that there is not a laurel crown for them as for the hosts who bore the brunt of battle, or went forth to save lives on the field, in the hospital or in the camp?

The women worked; sometimes alone, with no sympathizer for miles, more often in groups, but the "purpose" was ever the same. Linen sheets and fine table-cloths were sacrificed to make lint and bandages. Not only wives, mothers, sisters and sweethearts labored with the one object in view, but loyal women, who had no dear ones to go to the front, also joined in the good work. Societies there were in plenty, and of many names; but they had only one object—the amelioration of the soldier's condition. The close of the war saw many of these societies lapse for want of an object to keep up their interest; but in some of the States, when the veteran returned, suffering or needing a friend, then these aid societies rekindled the spark of enthusiasm, and when a census was taken in 1873, it was found that in sixteen States there were societies still in active existence.

So the Order grew from small beginnings. There were not many members in these bands, and, ten years later, when representatives were called together, it was found that, all told, there were only a few hundreds, but they had a fixed purpose, to which they still adhere—to care for the needy veteran and his dependent ones. When the Grand Army met in Indianapolis, with Paul Vandervoort as Commander-in-Chief, a resolution was passed summoning the loyal women of the United States to organize for charitable and patriotic effort, under the fostering care of the Grand Army. Two years later, the organization was perfected, and left with no restrictions upon it, but free to work out its own plan along the chosen lines. When, in the course of time, the organization was fully officered and ready, it was presented to the Grand Army of the Republic, and they forthwith adopted it. From the original handful, these women with a noble mission have grown, until at present they are almost 150,000 strong, and have expended in relief of the veteran and his needy ones, $2,347,000 since their organization. When the treasurer made her report in 1903, there was a balance of $14,048.52 in her hands, with no liabilities. In almost every State, there is now an institution supported by these women, or receiving help from them. Among the real estate owned by them, is the sacred spot now known as Andersonville Prison Park, where in they have erected a comfortable house, in which resides a caretaker, whose salary they pay.

The first object of this Order is "to especially aid and assist the Grand Army of the Republic, and to perpetuate the memory of their heroic dead." Each member of the Order also promises "to assist such Union veterans as need our help and protection, and to extend needful aid to their widows and orphans. To find them homes and employment, and assure them of sympathy and friends. To cherish and emulate the deeds of our army nurses, and of all noble women who rendered loving service to our country in her hour of peril." The better to carry out this pledge, there has been created a fund in every corps for relief work, and in almost all the States where homes for old soldiers are founded, there is also provision made for the wives and mothers of veterans, while a number of States have homes for orphans of the Union soldiers and sailors. The women saw that there would be need of patriotic teaching among the children of those who were flocking to our shores, so great stress is laid upon the third section, which is, "To maintain true allegiance to the United States of America, to inculcate lessons of patriotism and love of country among our children and in the communities in which we live, and encourage the spread of universal liberty and equal rights to all."

The Woman's Relief Corps was the first organization to take up the work of patriotic instruction in the public schools. It was its privilege to introduce the salute to the flag in the schools of every State in the Union. In each corps, a Committee on Patriotic Instruction is appointed, whose duty it is to see that schoolhouses are provided with flags, and that the children are taught the salute, and the flags are kept floating every school day in the year. The younger children are taught to say in unison, and with expressive motions; "We give our hands and our hearts to God and our country; one country, one language, one flag," their hands pointing to the flag with the last word, while the flag is dipped in answering salute. The salute for those of larger growth is: "I pledge allegiance to my flag and the Republic for which it stands; one nation indivisible, with liberty and justice for all."

The badge of the Woman's Relief Corps is a bronze Maltese cross, with the symbolic figures of the G. A. R. in the center, in a circle. This is pendent from a flag, attached to a bronze bar, upon which, in monogram, are the letters F. C. L., which stand for the talismanic words of the Grand Army of the Republic, as well as for its auxiliary: "Fraternal, Charity and Loyalty." This motto, is their guidon and glory. The Woman's Relief Corps always meets at the same time and place as the Grand Army of the Republic. The National officers are:

AT the St. Louis Exposition, an army of workmen, many thousands strong, have been employed constantly during the past few weeks, so that everything will be in perfect running order at the opening day. Any individual exhibitors who were unable to get their places in order were helped out by the management, under the arrangement of Mr. F. J. V. Skiff, Manager of Exhibits.

There may be some little delay connected with the foreign exhibits, but everything else is practically in a state of completeness. Everyone connected with the management of this Exhibition, from President Francis down, are enthusiastically sanguine as to its success from start to finish, and a larger attendance is confidently counted upon than any Fair of the kind has ever before called together.

The city of St. Louis, proud of the honor of being chosen as host, to entertain such throngs of people, has done its best to set its "house in order," and all visitors will find a cordial welcome. Hon. Rolla Wells, Mayor of the city, has been indefatigable in his efforts, seconded by his Council and other city authorities, to make their city a safe and clean abiding-place for the many strangers who will be within its gates for months to come. The Young Women's Christian Association have formed a Travelers' Aid Committee, to guard against the efforts of any evil-disposed persons, who might take advantage of the situation, and attempt to unduly influence any unprotected young women visiting the Fair, either as sightseers or in the hope of obtaining employment. The efforts of this committee have been ably seconded by other women throughout the country, notably by the New York City "Travelers' Aid Association." Many ladies prominent in literary and social circles have become interested in this movement, through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Miss Helen Gould said in a recent letter to Miss Egan, Secretary to the Board of Women Managers of the World's Fair: "One of my main objects in visiting the Fair is to cooperate with, and aid as far as lies in my power, the Young Women's Christian Association in their efforts to care for and protect the young girls who are going to St. Louis this summer. This is a matter which I take very much to heart's the young girls going to the Fair will be subjected to a great many temptations and snares." Miss Alice Roosevelt, daughter of President Roosevelt, will visit the Exposition during the latter part of May. This will be the young lady's first visit to St. Louis. Space forbids a commensurate description of the immensity and beauty of the buildings of this grand Exposition, which is as big again as the Chicago Fair, larger than the Pan-American, the Columbian Exposition, and the Centennial combined. The good people of St. Louis, in their generous hospitality, have sacrificed a large part of their beautiful wooded Forest Park where beautiful trees most without number, have been razed, leaving but wilderness, upon which the Exposition buildings stand. Some idea of the bigness of the outdoor shows, which are to be a remarkable feature of this Exposition, shown in the gigantic floral clock—which will keep time—covering a quarter of an acre, and with a minute hand weighing over a ton. The approximate cost of the Exposition will be $50,000,000, $10,000,000 of which is furnished by the city of St. Louis. The grounds are two miles long and about a mile wide. The main lagoon is 600 feet wide, and the path leading up to Festival Hall—which beautiful building crowns a hill—are 300 feet wide. Everything has been planned upon a most generous scale, and the vastness of it all can scarcely be realized until seen.

PIONEERING IN INCA-LAND

By A. R. STARK

YEARS of experience have proved how difficult it is to measure spiritual results in the lands of pal gloom, and where no religious liberty exists. In Peru, Spanish evangelistic work has taken its place among the doised things of the country. Gospel meetings are still held behind closed doors, in premises of inconspicuous appearance, and with no outward indication of place of worship or a temple where God is glorified. Nevertheless, souls are reached though the message of song and the preached Word. Only yesterday we heard of the director of the National College in a city far away in the Sierra, who had heard the Gospel in this while on a visit to Lima. There are many such who enter, hear the Gospel, and go to other parts of the country carrying with them a Bible or a Scriptural portion.

As the result of years of hard ploughing and sowing this field, there are groups of faithful Christians here! Here, as elsewhere, there are those who falter and fall; but this is no surprising, considering the fruit of Romanism as seen in the lives of both priest and people, and especially the social condition of the masses. From this special centre, four men and one woman are now out in the field of service here, pioneering for Christ. The woman visits the homes of Lima. Already the scarlet thread of the Gospel is being woven into hearts of many through her bright testimony.

Evangelization must be effected through itineration. Pioneer evangelists, these men have carried the "Good Tidings" far up the ridges of the Andes and down the eastern slopes of the Amazon, to scattered villages and lonely hamlets, proclaiming the message of salvation as they went.

Just now, two of these brave fellows are in the thick of the fight with fanaticism in Arequipa. This city is the stronghold of Romanism in Peru. Here the Bible is banned and burned, and in by-gone years colporteurs have been imprisoned for no other offence than selling the Bible in the streets. To-day, the few "Liberals" of the place are making a bold stand for freedom's rights. The house of one of them was mobbed last week, the windows and doors smashed, while the inmates—men, women and children—had a narrow escape. Ruffians fell indiscriminately and hurled stones at the house, endangering the lives of all present. In this very house there was a good missionary from Mexico, who chanced to be on a visit to Arequipa at the time. We quote from a letter of Rev. D. Watkins just to hand:

Our men are faithfully laboring here, and ask me to write a few lines in regard to what has passed here in this fanatical city of Arequipa. A week before I met your men I had written to see if a colporteur could be sent here. . . . It gives, as a rule, twice as much as you ask and gets much sooner than you expect. I was looking about for something to do for the Master. One day at the Hotel Inglis, I was informed that the proprietor was a Welshman, and that Dr. Harry Guinness, when on his way to Cusco, had once held a prayer-meeting in the room where I was seated. This encouraged me very much, indeed, I considered it the prayer before the sermon I preached on March 4, in a small room in the west part of the city. On the 25 of February, an armed mob attacked the house of Dr. Urquieta. The mob saw me enter and probably concluded to kill two birds with one stone—but, thank God! no one was hurt. The whole scene revived the sad memory of the anniversary of the cruel murder on the 2d of March by the Colics, of my comrade, the Rev. I. S. Stephens of Mexico. But on the 4th, I was happy, preaching the first Gospel sermon in Arequipa. I thank the doors are now open.

In spreading the knowledge of Christ through the length and breadth of this land, the experiences of travel form interesting chapters. Now we are crossing deserts as barren as the Sahara; now fording rivers and wading our way through fields of beautiful sugar-cane; anon we are climbing the mighty summits of the Andes, to visit lonely villages among the snows and glaciers. Again, we are transplanted into the Amazonian forest amid scenes of unsurpassed tropical beauty—where "only man is vile." In every place and among the varied peoples and tribes, there are ever those who welcome the messenger.

Here is an interesting paragraph from a recent journey in the primeval forest of South America by one of our workers—where a Christian missionary has never before stood:

Arrived at this lonely outpost, Boyero, on the Bajo Urubamba, a tributary of the Amazon, after eleven days on the road, via Lares. Many fatigues and some dangers. Scenery and experiences indescribable. To-day or to-morrow we start on our plunge into the real forest primeval—the sombre and endless avenue of plena montana. We journey as far as the river Yarero. Two leagues from here, I caught my first glimpse of the Campas, or Machiganga savages. Two or three huts on the banks of the Urubamba. I spoke with some of them a word or two in their own language. My traveling companion has prepared a dictionary of some 3,000 words and phrases. We sleep out in all kinds of queer lodgings, in real Amazonian forest weather.

We have stood on the banks of these mighty tributaries of the Amazon which pour their waters far into the Atlantic, and in the vast forest solitudes, where the silence is seldom broken, save by the thunder-clap and the crash of the falling tree in the storm. No definite estimate of the population of the wild children of the Peruvian forest has ever been made. There are many tribes, speaking different dialects. Chief among them are the Campas, Piros, Cashibos, Orejones, Conibos and Iberros. These wild Indians were never conquered by the Spaniards. The Campas and the Iberros are brave, warlike tribes. Those who live on the banks of the great navigable rivers are disappearing before the march of civilization.

Forest life of the savage Indian is of a very primitive character. The homestead is a hut, framed with logs and thatched with palm leaves, and varies in size according to the number of the family. Around this four-square hut are a few small round ones. With the bow and arrow the Indian is an expert; but beyond hunting jaguars and monkeys for food, and fighting, the men are indolent. The right to labor is conceded to women.

In attempting to evangelize these wild tribes, the missionary is face to face with difficulties at every step. The numbers composing the various tribes are small, and scattered over wide areas of virgin forest. The variety of their dialects and languages are so numerous that half a dozen different dialects are sometimes found along the same river. The tribes are being reduced through wars, the cruel treatment of traders and other natural consequences. Again, the regions they inhabit are most unhealthy and not adapted to the constitutions of natives of northern climates. But few and barbarous and pitiless though they be, they are human beings, for whom Christ died. So far, no Protestant Missionary Society has ever gone forth in the name of the Saviour to cast the Bread of Life on the great Peruvian affluents of the Amazon. May the Lord speed the Light in this immense vale of darkness!

I desire to heartily thank the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for aid sent to us in the past, and for this fresh token just to hand of your kind remembrance of Peru.

Callao, Peru.

To Help the Lepers of India

A NUMBER of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have sent contributions to aid in the purchase of an X-ray apparatus, to be used by Dr. Alice Condict in her medical work among the lepers of India. While taking a course in the Post-Graduate Medical School, Dr. Condict became much interested in Prof. Morton's work and his very satisfactory results in the use of radium and X-rays. It was then that she was encouraged to ask for the means to get the wonderful machine, which will pour "Liquid Sunshine" into the bodies of some of India's 250,000 lepers. A letter, just received by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from Dr. Morton, says:

I have yours of the 24th, and beg leave to enclose to you a reprint of my article, which appeared in the New York Medical Journal on February 13 and 20. As you will see, this article outlines a new discovery by myself, which practically means the introduction of light within the patient's tissues and blood and disease, and has about the same effect as letting light into a dark cellar where the plants were not thriving. The article was written entirely for the medical profession, and was revolutionary enough in itself to make it important to make very conservative statements. This I have done, but in private practice my results are better even than I have published.

In the above-mentioned article, Dr. Morton says:

In general, the proposition may be stated as follows: namely, to combine the properties possessed by the radium and the X-rays, of penetrating human tissue, with the facts of fluorescence of fluid solutions, and thus to establish a system by means of which we can flood the entire living organism with a fluorescent solution used medicinally, and, at the same time, by directing the radium or X-ray upon a given organ or seat of disease, or upon the whole body, set up, at the desired areas within the tissues, the violet, ultraviolet and other rays. This procedure obviously means the illumination of the interior of the tissues, as well as of the body as a whole, with light; that is to say, with that portion of the visible spectrum represented by the color of the particular fluorescence called into being, be this blue, violet or green. The catchword "liquid sunshine," has been humorously applied, and certainly, it may be asserted, that equivalents of portions of sunshine are, in this instance, artificially produced within the patient. And we may fairly argue that chemical and other effects are thus brought into very intimate internal relations with vital processes.

All contributions sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for Dr. Condict's X-ray machine for use among the lepers of India, will be duly acknowledged and forwarded.

The Talmage Memorial Stone, in Greenwood Cemetery

VISITORS to Greenwood Cemetery, Brooklyn, pause and stand in little groups at the grave of Dr. Talmage. A large and imposing stone of reddish-gray granite, with polished front and rough rock-like sides, has recently been erected, and marks, in a fitting manner, the resting-place of the great Divine who, throughout his long and busy lifetime, stood like an impregnable rock for the integrity of the Bible, and for simple, unadulterated Christianity.

The Problem of the Poor

HOW best to help the poor, is a problem which in these days of widespread destitution and helplessness urgently presses for a solution. Especially in our large cities, where there are thousands of the class known as "the deserving poor," is this becoming an acute question. Municipalities may make humanitarian laws; millionaires may endow various philanthropies, and students of sociology may propound their well-meant theories, but none of these remedies meet the real question at issue. Some preach thrift and others temperance, and still others may suggest a wide variety of panaceas and cure-alls for the ills of poverty; but the original question remains: How can the poor be helped most effectually? Charity is excellent in its place, but it affords only temporary relief, and, if continued, breaks down self-respect and leads to pauperism.

We submit this question to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. There are probably few who have not encountered the problem in some practical way. They have seen the struggle of the deserving poor, hoping against hope, and meeting every reverse and disappointment bravely, yet without making appreciable progress. They have doubtless tried, after their own methods, to help them out of the slough of despond. We know many of them, who have played the Good Samaritan with compassionate hearts, ever ready to give a share of what they possess to the needy. They may have thought out a plan of their own, which, if followed out widely, would be a blessing to many. We want all such to give to the world, through these columns, the benefit of their conclusions.

If, in the multitude of consolers, there should prove to be the wisdom that is needed to evolve a plan which will stand the test of practical application—some method that will help to raise a man from the low level of indigence without making him a mendicant or a confirmed dependent on others—the world will be the better for it. All letters on this subject should be addressed "Poor Problem, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York."

A Plotter's Downfall

SELFISH and ambitious politicians in all lands may learn a lesson from the downfall of Alexieff, the Russian Viceroy of Manchuria. That official, with his colleague Bezobrazeff, belong to a type of men existing alike under despotic, constitutional, and republican forms of government. They are the most dangerous of "soldiers of fortune"—men utterly unscrupulous and with only one principle of conduct. They seek their own advancement and emolument, under the guise of patriotism. It does not matter to them if they compromise the honor of their government, nor are they greatly concerned if their policy involves risk of national loss. If they can have the glory of extending their country's territories, and enjoy the pecuniary benefits which result from their aggressive policy, all is well, even though they bring the name of their country into contempt throughout the world.

Alexieff and Bezobrazeff worked together as partners in a vast speculative project. Alexieff, by his energy and skill in intrigue, had forced his way into the confidence of the Russian war-party, which takes the will of Peter the Great as its gospel. Through the influence of that party, he obtained high office in the Asiatic territories of Russia. He was not the kind of man that the peace-loving Emperor would have chosen; but the Emperor has too many subjects of concern, to study the characters of all the agents whom he must employ; and Alexieff's sponsors were men of power and influence, who knew the advantage that might come to themselves through such an instrument. His fortunes were therefore pushed, and he and his partner, Bezobrazeff, were intrusted with power that could be safely confided only to sagacious statesmen. That they deceived the Emperor, both as to the power of Japan and as to the Russian resources in Manchuria, there is no doubt. It is also charged, with some probability of truth, that they withheld from the Emperor, on the one hand, proposals from Japan which might have averted war; and from Japan, on the other hand, pledges from Russia, which Japan might have accepted. They evidently expected that Japan would not dare to fight, or that if she did, would easily be beaten. Duplicity and intrigue have often won in similar crises in Russian history, but in this instance the plotters had misunderstood the men with whom they had to deal.

As the world knows, disaster has followed disaster to Russian prestige. Incompetence and unpreparedness to a shameful degree, in the Russian administration of the province, have been revealed, and ignorance or rashness, or both, on the part of the plotters have been demonstrated. At last the Emperor's eyes have been opened to the character of the men whose culpable blunders have involved the Empire in disaster. He has appointed Alexieff's chief opponent, Admiral Skrydloff, to the command of the fleet, and Gen. Kourapatkin to the command of the army. Alexieff recognized at once the meaning of both appointments, and, perceiving that his ascendancy was at an end, he resigned. The conduct of the war is now in the hands of men who were not responsible for its outbreak. Whether they can snatch victory from defeat we have yet to learn, but if they cannot, they, at least, cannot be held accountable for the disaster. Alexieff is disgraced in the eyes of Russia and of the world, and his downfall is a conspicuous example of the evil of craft and duplicity in high position. As the Psalmist said: "He made a pit and digged it and is fallen into the ditch which he made. In the net which he hid is his own foot taken."

Woman's Status in Utah

WITH the resumption of the hearings in the Smoot case by the Senate Committee, the public is again compelled to endure with patience and some degree of tolerance, a mass of testimony of a character so extraordinary that it would be difficult to find its parallel even in the proceedings of a criminal court. Yet this painful ordeal is not without its compensation, for this unexampled expose of Mormon villainy—an expose which leaves little to the imagination, and eclipses all previous arraignments of Mormonism—has done more to open the eyes and stir the consciences of the American people than all that has been said and previously written on the subject.

Among the latest witnesses who appeared before the Committee was Brigham H. Roberts, whose expulsion from the House of Representatives four years ago, for polygamous practices, is still fresh in the minds of our readers. Before the Senate Committee, Roberts stated that he had been married three times; that the third ceremony, which was performed by Daniel H. Wells, "Counsel of the Twelve Apostles," was without witnesses, and that Roberts successfully concealed the fact of the marriage from his other wives for three years. It is incredible that the Mormon Church and its dignitaries could have been ignorant of this secret and unwitnessed marriage of one of their leaders. They knew of it, but shut their eyes, as they expected others in turn to be blind to their own notorious immoralities.

One of the "Patriarchs" of the Mormon Church, Angus M. Cannon, was a witness whose testimony is probably the most extraordinary that has yet been given in the present investigation. It discloses not a glimpse, but a broad view, of the startling depravity to which the principles and practice of Mormonism lead its adherents. This witness admitted, that in 1858 he "married two women the same hour." He afterward married four others. All six are still living. Three children were born to him since the manifesto. This Patriarch of the Mormon Church admitted on the witness stand, that he was "living in violation of the laws of God and man." Like the wives of other leaders who had testified, his wives had no opportunity to oppose or consent to his multiplied marriages. They were simply ignored—treated like purchased cattle. Such is the status of womanhood in Utah.

Abundant and convincing testimony has been adduced at previous hearings, to prove the malign influence of the Mormon Church in State and national politics. So overwhelming has been the evidence on this line, that the case of Smoot has dwindled into comparative significance, and may well be regarded as an incidental issue in the great campaign which the American people are now beginning against Mormonism. To-day we have directed attention more particularly to the aspects of the case that directly affect the women of Utah, and of every Mormon community in the land.

How long will it be ere the poor white slaves of Mormonism are enfranchised; how long before this system, which drags down body and soul alike, shall be abolished? Our national legislators owe it to the women of the country, and to the self-respect of the whole people, to stamp it out forever.

Another Great Opportunity

TO meet the enormous demand indicated by advance orders, we printed last Fall 50,000 sets of THE CROWN ENCYCLOPEDIA, consisting of 5 volumes, aggregating over 1000 pages, with more than 500 illustrations, and 96 colored maps, all brought right down to date. This Encyclopedia is brand new. All its 65,000 topics are right up to January of this year. Panama's Independence, Maps of Russia and Japan, Radium X Ray, Automobile, Wireless Telegraphy, the Alaskan Boundary Decision—all have their places in this most modern of Encyclopedias. It is the kind of work for which you would gladly pay $40 or $50, if, with very margins and heavier paper, it were spread out over a dozen bulky volumes; for in these 65 pages there is much later and better information than in many a much more pretentious work.

Sets Slightly Damaged

Of our large edition of The Crown Encyclopedia nearly 900 sets were slightly damaged—that is, some sets were scratched or rubbed, although almost imperceptibly so—while others had been misaddressed, and were returned by the express companies as undeliverable, and, though hardly hurt, cannot again be sent out as absolutely new.

The insides are perfect in every respect, and the damage to the covers in no case exceeds the ordinary wear and tear incident to a single month's use.

★ ★ ★ ★

(These sets, neatly packed, we will sell at ONE DOLLAR, charges collect at your end, or at $1.50, delivered free.) If you live at a great distance from New York, you will do better to send us $1.50 and let us prepay the charges, but if you are nearby, you can save money by sending us only $1.00 and paying express charges on delivery of goods. Each set weighs seven pounds.

It is indeed a sacrifice to sell these handsome books at this price, but as we require the room taken up by these sets, which we cannot send out as absolutely new, we have concluded to give our subscribers the advantage of this bargain.

Toronto's Great Fire

NEVER in the history of Toronto has there been so destructive a conflagration as that which swept through the business section of the city on April 19. Shortly before nine o'clock in the evening, flames were seen in a soap factory on Wellington Street. They quickly spread to adjoining buildings, and as a high wind was blowing, leaped across the street and ignited buildings on the opposite side. Thence the fire spread westward, crossing Bay Street, and destroying the office of the Evening Telegram and several large wholesale dry-goods houses. A gutta-percha factory was caught in the flames, and its combustible contents gave added impetus to the force of the fire. The wind continued fresh, carrying sparks of flying debris onward until buildings as far as Front Street were burning fiercely. The dread of the firemen was that it might change to the north, involving the whole city in the flames. Happily that calamity was averted. During the whole night and until four o'clock in the morning, the fire raged on unchecked. It was feared that the Bank of Montreal and the Queen's Hotel would both be destroyed, but before the fire reached them it was brought under control. The local fire department worked manfully, and appeals for help planet with all its immensity, is to electric currents virtually no more than a small metal ball, and that by virtue of this fact many possibilities, each baffling imagination and of incalculable consequence, are rendered absolutely sure of accomplishment; it is shown that a telegraphic message, almost as secret and non-interferable as a thought, can be transmitted to any terrestrial distance, the sound of the human voice, with all its intonations and inflections faithfully and instantly reproduced at any other point of the globe, it is easy to see how enormous will be the result." If there is indeed such a reservoir of electricity at hand, which can be utilized, men will not be slow to take advantage of it. Unhappily, there is not the same alertness to obtain and use the spiritual power which God has placed within their reach.

All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye, therefore and teach (Matt. 28:18).

A Mother's Long Journey

A strangely clad woman was observed wandering about the streets of New York last week. She wore Oriental garments, and seemed to shrink with painful bashfulness from the curious gaze of the people who crowded about her. She had come from Zimorin, near Jerusalem, and had never seen a modern city before.

like condition in our relations with our Heavenly Father. It was He who sought and saved us through his Son.

God commendeth his love toward us in that while we were yet sinners Christ died for us (Rom. 5:8).

Doctors Infected

Sad intelligence was given out last week from Bellevue Hospital, New York. It was that several of the doctors had fallen ill, and that two of them, in the wards where consumptive patients are treated, have contracted the disease. One of them is lying at his home in a critical condition, and the other has been sent to a sanatorium. Others have been ill from other diseases, and one has died. Fully a dozen have been obliged to give up their work on account of illness since the beginning of the year. The hospital is terribly overcrowded, while the medical staff has not been increased. The doctors have consequently been overworked, and have had no time for exercise in the open air. They must breathe the air in the rooms where patients afflicted with the disease are lying, and no amount of care can prevent their receiving the tuberculous germs. As one of the doctors said: "These germs are very tenacious of life and fly about in the dust, and the air becomes tainted. Contagion in this way has been especially liable to happen in the case of some of our physicians, who have were sent to London, Hamilton, Montreal, and Buffalo. The last named city sent a crew of thirty-three men with their fire-apparatus by special train. The loss is estimated at nearly fifteen million dollars. The fire devastated fourteen blocks, containing one hundred and thirteen buildings, in which about two hundred and fifty firms were doing business. It is feared that fully seven thousand persons must be temporarily thrown out of employment by the disaster. Many of the destroyed buildings were believed to be fireproof, but, as in other recent great fires, the boast was not made good. The fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is (I. Cor. 3:13)

Gather Electricity

A tower recently erected at Wardencliff, N. Y., has excited the curiosity of the people of the district. The tower is octagonal in shape, and is 180 feet high. It consists of huge wooden beams, strongly braced, and is mounted by a cupola of interlaced steel wires, bent as to form an arc. Within the cupola is a wooden platform from which there is communication by wire to the earth. Mr. Tesla is the designer of the tower, and it is understood that a wealthy capitalist is furnishing the funds for experiments, which are expected to produce a revolution in our system of telegraphy, and the development of electrical power. Mr. Tesla's theory is that the revolution of the earth on its axis develops an enormous accumulation of electricity in the surrounding atmosphere, which may be collected, and applied to any purpose for which electricity is now used, thus saving the enormous cost incurred in producing the current by mechanical means. He says: When the great truth accidentally revealed and experimentally confirmed, is fully recognized, that this

Her story, as she gave it through an interpreter, was that she and her husband and their little boy had been growing poorer every year. Some one from America had advised them to come here, but they could not raise funds for the passage of the whole family. The husband and the little boy came as soon as they had sufficient money, leaving the wife and mother behind to earn her own passage money. One letter had reached her after their arrival, saying that they were going to stay in New York, where the husband had obtained employment in a cloak factory. For more than a year she waited, hoping to receive the letter which her husband promised to send, with money to help her to come out; but no letter came. The mother pined for her child. She felt a resentment to her husband for having apparently forgotten her; but her hunger for the sight of her little son became every day more intense. At last she could bear it no longer, and she packed up a small bundle of her treasures and set out. Her little store of money was exhausted by the time she reached Budapest. She wandered about there in despair until a benevolent Jew saw her and gave her money to reach Vienna. There other Jews came to her relief and enabled her to get to New York. Here she knew no one, but she was cared for by wealthy members of her race. Every day and all day she roamed about the streets looking for her child, and at last, in a crowded street, she saw him playing with other children. The joy of the poor mother at the reunion was pathetic. As she told the interpreter, the misery of the waiting and the toil of the long journey were all forgotten in the bliss of meeting her boy. The child himself had probably thought little of her and was enjoying his play; but the mother was so concerned as to expose herself to travel and hardship for his sake. How few realize that there is a been overworked during the past six months, as a person in a tired or run-down condition is much more apt to contract tuberculosis in this way, than one in perfect health." It is so with moral infection. No one is so liable to fall into prevalent sin as the man whose moral fibre has been weakened by indulgence in some personal evil habit. Temptation, no matter how fierce, is sure to fail if the Christian is in the condition of his Lord.

The Prince of this world cometh but hath nothing in me (John 14:30).

BRIEF NOTES

The Utah Gospel Mission, of which Rev. John D. Nutting is Secretary, has issued its annual report. It shows that five men are now actively at work, and that colporteur visits are being made throughout the State. Nearly a million pages of special literature have been put in circulation, and many public meetings have been held. Several hopeful conversions from Mormonism are recorded.

One of the most energetic and successful additions to the ranks of the Church Missionary Society, is Rev. Luigi Carlo Perum, formerly a priest of the Church of Rome and Carmelite monk, who worked as a missionary in Travancore, and was drawn to inquire into the theological position of Protestants, by the godly lives of some Church Missionary Society native pastors and missionaries.

The evangelistic campaign at Pittsburg, Pa., has resulted in the bringing of about six thousand persons into church fellowship. Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman, J. M. Gray and L. W. Munhall were among the preachers. A committee representing fifteen denominations had charge of the work. The attendance throughout was large, with increased religious interest in the community.

We are still giving, Free, a copy of the great RUSSO-JAPANESE WAR ATLAS to every person who sends 25 cents for a nine-weeks' trial subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Thousands of our readers have taken advantage of this unusual offer, and have made their friends happy by sending them the paper, while retaining the beautiful Atlas for themselves. The book alone is easily worth the price of the subscription. Write today, before the supply is exhausted.

JAPAN THE FRIEND OF ALL NATIONS

An Authorized Interview with Mr. Kogoro Takahira, the Japanese Ambassador, By CHARLES M. PEPPER

MR. KOGORO TAKAHIRA, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of Japan to the United States, has contributed exclusively to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, from the Legation at Washington, an interview defining the policy of his government in relation to some of the most important questions that have arisen in connection with the war between Japan and Russia. Count Cassini, the Russian Ambassador, was invited to make a statement in behalf of his government, but has not responded.
